I do not wish to encroach upon the time of the Senator at this moment, but I will say there is a deep significance in a foreign corporation seeking at this time the acquisition of oil lands. I have in my hand a letter of the secretary of the Rocky Mountain division of the Roxana Petroleum Co., of Oklahoma, in which he complains about one of the provisions of the bill, by which only a limited number of acres—2,560—can be acquired, and that, under the provision of this bill, it would interfere with the plan of campaign of the Dutch Co. to acquire oil territory in the United States. It is a competitor of the Standard Oil Co. in everything except prices; they agree upon prices. So there is a competition for the acquisition of our land and by a foreign corporation.

The Senator has proposed an amendment, I believe, at any rate an amendment will be submitted, by which small claimants may have the right, which is not given at present in the bill, to organize for the purpose of transportation and refining. That seems to meet one of the honest objections. If the small owners of claims may unite for the purpose of transportation and refining, they can compete with the Dutch Co. and with the Standard Oil Co., but these lawyers, I rose to state, are the attorneys of a subsidiary corporation, foreign owned or controlled, and there are many such subsidiary corporations, possibly which design to undermine the great hope of this country to own and control its mineral resources. We should pass no legislation to allow a loophole in the law by which foreign owners—perhaps hostile owners—can gain control of mineral lands which yield the sinews of war.

The protests and advertisements of these attorneys should be disregarded.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from California for that information. I was satisfied that these gentlemen did represent the Royal Dutch Shell Oil Co.; that they represent the subsidiaries of that foreign corporation. Not only that, but there was another advertisement in a morning newspaper, I believe signed by Mr. Ball. I am very credibly informed—and I do not think it will be denied—that Mr. Ball is the consulting geologist of the Roxana Co. In other words, we have a great foreign oil monopoly coming here pretending to represent the independent oil operators of Wyoming, while it is apparent that they are attempting to establish a monopoly equal to that of the Standard Oil Co. They are using the old cry of the Standard Oil Co. to cover up their own monopoly, but the cloven hoof is uncovered when you read in their advertisements that by limiting the amount of land that shall be leased to one lessee to 2,560 acres you are not going to permit one company to get strong enough to fight the Standard Oil Co. That alone should be sufficient; but if that did not settle the question, this letter [exhibiting], which has been put into the RECORD from a committee of the independent operators of Wyoming, absolutely repudiating these advertisements, denying that they stand for what the advertisements stand for, and stating that they stand for this bill, ought to end the whole question now and forever.

I have heard intimations that possibly some Senator might move to recommit this bill. I can not believe such a thing for a moment—to recommit a bill that has been before Congress for four long years; to recommit a bill on which there have been 20 or 30 hearings; to recommit a bill by reason of charges by some one who is afraid to come before a committee—why, it is preposterous!

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have not yet concluded.

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator from Nevada be willing to eliminate from this bill sections 16 and 17, and bring in a new bill, and give us opportunity to be heard upon the remedial features of this proposed law?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I stated the other day that the constant fighting of individuals for remedies applicable to their particular case tempted me personally to favor that course; but I see nothing to be accomplished by it. I had just as lief settle the question now as to settle it later, if we have got to settle it later.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. If a mistake is made in the passage of this bill, it will not be by reason of the intent of any of us to do anyone an injustice, but I know, Mr. President, from my own examination that there is a want of knowledge of the facts with reference to the Wyoming situation. If the Senator in charge of the bill will be willing to eliminate sections 16 and 17 from the bill and let us have a separate bill, I think we shall produce some facts before the committee; and whose ever fault it may be that they have not been heretofore produced, they would be enlightening to the committee and to the entire Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, we were somewhat in the dark with regard to the Wyoming situation when this matter first came before the Senate, but we are not in the dark with regard to it now—not in the slightest degree. We have very accurate knowledge with regard to the gentlemen who have been getting these advertisements out; and, fortunately, gentlemen representing the independent operators of Wyoming, who were selected at a mass meeting, have come before us and have laid down very clearly the Wyoming situation. They have stated in writing exactly what the people of Wyoming think in regard to this bill. They have stated the amendments that they want. Those amendments in the main are rather of expression than of material significance. I have not seen any particular objection to any of the amendments that the Wyoming gentlemen who have been here have suggested.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not referred as yet to one of the amendments which has been suggested; and that is in the general leasing provisions of the bill—I have no reference to sections 16 and 17 now—where it is provided that when oil is discovered the discoverer shall be entitled to patent to one-fourth of the acreage of his permit. They want to get permission to secure the entire area of the original permit.

Mr. PITTMAN. Wait a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. That is one of the amendments they have suggested.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is not exactly correct, I will state to the Senator. He is somewhat in error. They propose that, after a discovery of oil under a permit, the permittee shall have the option, in lieu of obtaining title to one-fourth of the area of the permit, to surrender the right to such patent and take a lease on the whole area.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the Senator has perhaps stated it technically more correctly than I did, but I assume that the permittee will always take the whole area. The gentlemen referred to want an amendment to the bill under which, when they discover oil, they can either take a fourth of the area of the permit or all of it—and I have little doubt that they would take it all—the only difference being in the class of title they would get. In one case they would get their patent, while in the other case they would get a lease.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think that that is a very material amendment. Does the Senator think it is?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is quite material, and my own idea is that it ought not to be agreed to; but I only mention that because the Senator expressed himself as rather in favor of most of the amendments which they propose, or rather as being of the opinion that they were not important. It seems to me that that would be a very important amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not see that it seriously affects the public domain as to whether a permittee surrenders claim of title to one-fourth and takes a lease of three-fourths, or whether he takes title to one-fourth and applies as a lessee under the general terms of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. If he applies as a lessee, he would be subject to competition; in other words, as a reward for his efforts in getting oil he would, under the bill if it becomes a law, get patent to one-fourth of the area under his prospecting permit, and as to the balance of it he would come in competition with the entire world, the remainder of the area of that permit being subject to lease after competition.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know whether it would be more to the interest of the Government to give title to 640 acres or to lease 2,560 acres. That is just the question.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. KENDRICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom—to the Senator from Idaho or the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KENDRICK. I believe the Senator from Nebraska is laboring under a misconception of the amendment. The particular provision of the bill allows a prospector in case of discovery to secure title to one-fourth of the land, and it concludes by saying that he may have a lease on the remaining three-fourths; but it seems to imply no obligation that he shall have a lease. In my State a prospector must be prepared when he goes out to look for oil to expend large sums of money; but under this particular provision it is intended that he shall have only partial compensation. The independent oil operators in Wyoming believe that the prospector ought to have title to one-fourth and a preferential lease on the remainder; but instead of asking for that they ask for the alternative, or that it be made optional as to whether the prospector may accept title to one-fourth or a preferential lease on all of the land included within his permit. I do not believe that the Senator from Nebraska understood the proposed amendment in that way.

Mr. PITTMAN. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator in charge of the bill to state that the representatives selected at the public meeting in Wyoming came before the committee?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I said they have prepared a letter which has been presented and read. They are here. They called upon me this morning, and they handed me the letter which I have put in the RECORD.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Senator in charge of the bill is favorable to the amendments which they propose?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I did not say I was in favor of the amendments suggested by them. I stated that I did not think any of the amendments are very material or change to any great extent the bill as it now stands. As an illustration, the question just came up of a suggested amendment making it optional to accept a lease for 2,560 acres instead of a patent for 640 acres——

Mr. BORAH. But there are some of those suggested amendments which are vital. Of course, if the Senator is in a position to favor those amendments it will put an entirely different face upon the situation; but, unless those amendments are adopted, I think it would be most unfortunate to pass sections 16 and 17 of this bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know whether the Senator is familiar with the amendments. I will inquire if he has read the amendments submitted by the Wyoming representatives?

Mr. BORAH. I have.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator favor all of them?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not know that I do. But there are some of them that I do favor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, I understood the Senator to say that it would be unfortunate if they were not all adopted.

Mr. BORAH. I did not say that. I said, "Unless the amendments are adopted." That did not necessarily include each one of them.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am exactly in the position the Senator is—some of them I favor and some of them I doubt; but I will be able to pass on them.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether he has offered the amendments to which he has referred?

Mr. BORAH. They will be offered.

Mr. PENROSE. They have not been offered yet? I am asking the question for information.

Mr. BORAH. No; they have not been offered, and will not be until 2 o'clock, for I presume no opportunity to do so will be afforded until then.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is another question to which I desire to advert before passing from this matter. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] asked me whether or not I favored limiting the leasing under section 16 to 2,560 acres. I want to state that this matter was discussed most thoroughly at a meeting of a joint committee composed of three representatives of the Public Lands Committee of the other House, three representatives of the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, two representatives of the Interior Department, two representatives of the Navy Department, and two representatives of the Department of Justice. Those proceedings are set forth in the hearings on House bill 406, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session; and in that report the Department of the Interior urged that those who actually had producing wells and had complied with the other requirements of section 16 be allowed a lease on each claim, but limiting the claim to 40 acres instead of 160 acres. The joint committee, however, finally agreed that if you were going to lease 2,560 acres, and some man had a well on each mining claim of the 2,560 acres producing oil, he was not only entitled to a preference lease by reason of the development, but that the Government itself would be benefited by leasing a full claim of 2,560 acres to the man who had the producing well there instead of leasing it to three or four people. At that hearing the representative of the Department of the Interior submitted section 16; and section 16, as submitted by the Department of the Interior at that hearing, and as recommended to go into this bill, is practically in the identical words with section 16 of this bill, with the exception of the amendments that have been offered more clearly defining the words "asserted under the mining law."

I ask permission to be allowed to have printed in the RECORD section 16 as submitted by the Department of the Interior and proposed to the joint committee, to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

That upon relinquishment to the United States within 90 days after final denial or withdrawal of application for patent, of any claim asserted under the mining laws to any unpatented oil or gas lands included in an order of withdrawal of naval petroleum reserve No. 2, in the State of California, the claimant shall be entitled to a lease for each asserted mineral location of 160 acres or less, upon which such claim is based and upon which said claimant, his predecessor in interest, or those claiming through or under him have, prior to the date of this act, drilled one or more producing oil or gas wells, such lease to be upon a royalty of one-eighth of the production of oil or gas produced and saved therefrom after first deducting from the gross production such oil or gas as may be used in the development or operating of said lands, and otherwise on the same terms and conditions as other oil and gas leases granted under the provisions of this act: Provided, That within 90 days from the date of this act or of final denial or withdrawal of application for patent, the applicant for a lease shall pay the United States for one-eighth of the oil or gas produced from the lands included in said claim subsequent to ———, at the current field price at time of production, which shall be in full satisfaction for all oil or gas extracted from said land prior to said lease: Provided further, That all royalties received under the provisions of this section from said naval petroleum reserve No. 2, whether in oil or money, shall be delivered or credited to the United States Navy: And provided further, That none of the provisions of this section or of this act shall be applicable to or effect lands or minerals included within the limits of naval petroleum reserve No. 1, in the State of California, or naval petroleum reserve No. 3, in the State of Wyoming.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if certain amendments which are to be offered to this bill are accepted by the Senate I shall probably vote for it under a species of moral compulsion. I am not in favor of the so-called leasing policy proposed by the Government. I do not want to see my Government occupy the attitude of a vast continental landlord. I do not believe that it will make for the progress of society, for the development of the West, or for the good of our population; and, so believing, I have always opposed it. I have not changed my convictions upon the subject in the slightest; but when at the bar I always, after a thorough defeat, was ready to compromise, not because I wanted to but because I had to.

When the Supreme Court of the United States handed down its decision on the Adamson Act it also decided the Utah power case. The one decision was eclipsed by the other because of its transient importance; but the Utah power case is one of the most important, far-reaching, and disastrous decisions, as suggested by the Senator from Arizona, that has been made by that distinguished tribunal in many years. If I may paraphrase that once popular but erroneous quotation from the Dred Scott decision, the Supreme Court there decided that as to the continental domain, the public domain, the States have no rights which the Government or anybody else is bound to respect. For the first time in the history of our Government it has been decided by the court of last resort that the sovereign power of eminent domain which Calhoun very truly declared to be inseparable from sovereignty no longer exists in States like Colorado and Arizona as applied to the public domain.

It is unnecessary to do more than refer to that decision now, because the time at my disposal and the condition of my voice both protest against it. However, it has had the same effect upon me that Appomattox had upon the soldiers of the Southern army. They were then ready to take the oath. We will get what we can, because we can not get what we want.

I may say, before referring directly to the bill, that the present occupant of the chair [Mr. KING in the chair] on last Friday expressed my views regarding the general framework of this bill so completely and so much more eloquently and logically than I can that I can refer to it as the indolent old fellow used to refer to the printed prayer placed above his bed, who every night before retiring pointed to it, saying: "O, Lord, them's my sentiments." It is not necessary, therefore, for me to enlarge with reference to the general features of the bill.

Mr. President, there is much unconscious humor in some of our proceedings here. For a dignified body perhaps it is more delightful because it is unconscious. The reputed author of this bill is not a humorist, and yet he has entitled the bill as one "to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and potassium," and so forth. "To encourage and promote!" Why, Mr. President, this bill should have been entitled "A bill to discourage and limit" the mining of all these things the products of which to-day are so essential to the very life of the Nation.

I have listened with much interest to the arguments this morning, which are based upon the theory that this bill is going to develop the public resources. My very dear friend and colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] seems to feel that under it a lot of coal land will be sold to private purchasers. Not one acre of coal land will be purchased under this bill, for the reason that it will be administered by a department thoroughly imbued with this new policy of conserving everything in the country until after the day of judgment, so that the angels and the goats may have something to develop and thus pass away their time through all eternity.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to state to the Senator that my views as to the entry system or the sale system have not been modified and they conform to those of the Senator; but when he says there will be no development under this bill, it seems to me he overlooks the provision with respect to the coal lands.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no. The Senator has read that, and I have read all of the Senator's arguments here. My colleague differs from me in that he is a cheerful optimist. He always looks on the bright side of things, and that is the reason that I am so much fleshier than he is. But the Senator is doomed to disappointment. That is simply an assertion; let us call it a prophecy and let it go at that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield for a moment. I only have a very few minutes, however.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that we have used the exact language that is on the statute books now.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I know.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And we say that the Secretary of the Interior shall offer such coal lands and award the same through advertisement, just as he does in leasing.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; and we also said in the Pickett bill that relief should be granted to those who have taken advantage of the largess of the Government and located and occupied the oil lands—that he should, having exercised due diligence, be entitled to relief. How was the statute construed? Why, Mr. President, if any locator at the time that bill went into effect was even temporarily away from his claim he was constructively out of possession, could not show diligence, and was excluded from the benefits of the law.

That, Mr. President, is a sample of these departmental constructions of a remedial statute.

This has been said to be a bill for relief. It is. It relieves a great many of the citizens of your State and of mine, a great many citizens of the West, of property rights which they have lawfully acquired, and then proposes to lease them at terms satisfactory to the national bureaucracy.

Mr. President, the one thing which makes me hope that some benefit will flow from this bill is my desire to see the men who have taken advantage of the opportunities given by the statutes of their country, who have given their time, their money, some of them their entire youth, some of them their lives, in developing the public domain, who have braved the horrors of the desert and the terrors of the climate, suffered all of those privations which but for the lure of wealth would never be encountered, and who have acquired something as a consequence of these risks and hardships, obtain some relief, some escape from a policy which, impliedly at least, regards them as lawbreakers and criminals and proceeds to treat them accordingly.

We are imitators, Mr. President. We read that when the savages inhabited this country, when the Iroquois Tribes captured an enemy they lined up the squaws and the warriors, armed with tomahawks and clubs and other deadly weapons, in parallel rows. Then the captive was required to run the gantlet between them. If he reached the other end of the line, they spared his life. If he did not, the Lord may have had mercy on him and shortened his agonies. Now, we are imitators, for that is how the Government in the last few years has treated the western pioneer, the man who has sought to develop our mineral wealth.

We have bands of Iroquois down here in these departments, but we call them bureaus and bureau chiefs. Our people must run the gauntlet of the Land Office and of the Reclamation Office and of the Forest Service and of all the others. A few have survived. But recently, and because some have escaped, the Secretary of the Navy, on the one hand, and the Attorney General, on the other, has each armed himself and his department with bludgeons, and taken positions at the end of the line, where they can whack the victim who may be so hardy as to reach them.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Away down below.

Mr. THOMAS. Clear down, yes; and may the good Lord have mercy on the poor citizen of the United States who, having believed in the bona fides of his Government, has sought to develop its resources, when he reaches the city of Washington and asks for his reward!

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They will get him if he gets here.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; if they do not get him "a-comin," they are pretty apt to get him "a-gwine," as the old darky said. It is because of these conditions that I hope to do something to help these claimants so long denied of justice, if we can do it.

We are met here with much opposition, one element of which has reference to the Standard Oil Co., which is said to be the bill's chief beneficiary. Mr. President, I have as little use for the Standard Oil monopoly as anybody. I have denounced it ever since I was old enough to pronounce the words which form the title of the concern, and I am conscious of the fact that there is a well-grounded and justifiable popular prejudice against that and similar organizations. For that reason it has been capitalized here for the purpose of beating this bill. It has but little interest in fact, if the records of the Government and the courts of Wyoming are at all reliable.

Reference was made here this morning, by the Senator having charge of the bill, to an advertisement in the Post the other day, a page advertisement signed by some lawyer and warning us against the Standard Co. Well, there was a half-page advertisement this morning, another one, signed by somebody calling himself a former employee of the Geological Department of the Government. That settled him with me. This statement, however, is no reflection whatever upon the distinguished head of that bureau. But he did not say that he was the geologist for this Roxana Co. which has just gone up into Wyoming and which proposes to conjure with the Standard Oil Co. in order to enable the Dutch Shell Co., which seems to be at the head of the Roxana Co. across the sea, to "get its work in," as the boys say, in Wyoming.

I am glad to see them go to Wyoming where they are needed; but would it not have been a little better if Mr. Ball had in his newspaper disquisition announced his interest as the geologist for this company? He believes, perhaps, in a wheatless day. He certainly practices some of the mysteries which are associated with a lightless night.

I am told by citizens of my State, my neighbors, in whom I believe, in the city of Denver, officers of the Mid-West Co., that the Standard Oil Co. has nothing to do except in business ways with the Mid-West Oil Co., and I believe it. I must believe it if I believe in the integrity of my neighbors, which I do. The Standard has interests there, the Ohio Oil Co. being the corporate name of the concern which it operates. It has a refinery there which utilizes a process for the manufacture of gasoline of which they control the exclusive patent, and that is about all. But, Mr. President, if the Standard Oil Co., monster monopoly as it is, has, as a citizen of the United States, taken advantage of the provisions of the law then existing and located public lands and complied with the law, is there any man with a proper sense of justice in his heart who would deny to that company, because it is a monopoly, the same rights that we extend to every citizen? If it be shown that the Standard Oil Co. have sunk a number of producing wells under the law, are they not entitled to all the benefits of this bill if we pass it?

It seems to me that common justice—that justice for which Western Senators and Representatives have been beseeching the Congress for so long—would be no justice at all if it discriminated between great as against small concerns in a relief measure of this character.

So much, Mr. President, for the general subject of this bill. I could say more if I had time; but, not having time, I will proceed at once to the details of the bill. I perceive that the hour of 2 o'clock is approaching, and in order to keep the floor for 10 minutes afterwards I have some amendments here that I should like to offer at this time and then discuss two or three of these sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator desire to have the amendments read?

Mr. THOMAS. I shall not ask to have them read now, but I want it understood that I am now speaking on the amendments under the 10-minute rule.

Something was said in the discussion, I think by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], to the effect that there was no limitation upon the amount of oil which would be acquired under this section 16. I think there is a very decided limitation. No lease can be granted to more than 160 acres and not then unless there is a producing well upon it. There is a distinct and decided limitation. It may be that John Smith may own half a dozen 160-acre claims with a well upon each of them, but what of it? If he has spent his money in the sinking of the wells and has brought in producing claims, why should he not have a lease upon them? Why should he not have a lease upon 10,000 of them if he has upon each of them sunk a producing well under the law? Why should there be any other limitation if the number of claims which he has thus developed exceeds the four sections provided for in the development part of the bill?

But there is another limitation which grows out of the physical conditions in Wyoming. The number of acres affected by this section, I am informed by those who know, is in the aggregate less than 9,000, much of which is now pending on application for patent. So the limitation imposed by existing conditions makes it impossible, no matter what the language used in the section may be, to obtain much more in any one instance, if at all, than the amount which is fixed as the standard for the general operation of the leasing sections of the bill.

It has been suggested, Mr. President, and I think it a good one, that on page 12, at the end of line 16, before the beginning of line 17, the words "in the absence of an adverse claim" should be inserted.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was simply going to suggest that in the case of an adverse claim confirmed they could not grant a lease to anyone. Would it not serve the same purpose to say "until after final disposition of the adverse claim"?

Mr. THOMAS. I am not particular about the phraseology. I am perfectly willing it should be thus expressed.

In line 25, after the word "land," I believe there should be an amendment reading as follows:

And to be for a period of 20 years, with the right of the lessee to a renewal of the same for successive periods of 10 years.

A man has a producing well or claim. He has sunk it with his own money and at his own risk. If it is not exhausted at the end of 20 years, he should certainly have a perfect right to renew his lease so long as he sees fit to work it. If the old law had been permitted to remain as it was, he would of course have been given absolute title to the premises, and which he expected at the time he located the property.

I will offer as an amendment those two suggestions and hand them to the Secretary later.

With reference to section 17 a great deal more should be said at this time. That section is designed to safeguard the rights of those who under existing law have made locations on the unreserved domain which have not been perfected by patent and on which everything has been done as required by the law except the making of a discovery. My first comment upon that section is that the limitation of five years is wrong. Let me say here that the right to obtain a patent upon mineral lands is not obligatory; it is permissive. A man may without a patent, so long as he complies with the law, enjoy all the advantages of the mining claim which the patent confers. Some of them perhaps for that reason have failed to make application, others for lack of money, and still others because of the difficulty of securing a market for the oil after they acquire it. But it is not right to draw an arbitrary line between the claims of all who have been operating under the law and who have done everything which the law requires except to make a discovery. Why should a man with a 5-year-old claim be protected while a man with a claim 5 years and 1 month old is denied the justice which it is said the bill will confer. I think that limitation should be eliminated.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will state that the reason why the committee put in a certain limitation was because of the controversy that arose over that provision, in which the Department of the Interior participated before the committee. The department took the position that they would have to determine the adverse right, of course, to determine the equity before they can lease to anyone. They said if there is no limitation placed upon the date of the location they might go back indefinitely, and they realized that innumerable contests would arise which it would be very difficult, if not almost impossible, to equitably and justly settle. The committee then placed three years as the limitation. Then, on the floor of the Senate it was amended to five years, and that is the way it stands. I am simply suggesting that as the argument presented to the committee.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield, but I have not much time.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada before——

Mr. THOMAS. It is not to be taken from my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be taken from the Senator's time if he holds the floor.

Mr. KING. Let it be taken out of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado has two minutes left.

Mr. KING. I shall not interrupt the Senator, then.

Mr. THOMAS. The fear on the part of the Interior Department that it might have too much work to do in order to establish the rights of citizens under this law does not appeal to me. If we are to pass a law we ought to pass one that will be just to everybody, and because the Interior Department fears it might have to work unduly does not appeal to me at all. We either should do justice to all the men who are entitled to relief under this bill or we ought not to pass it. It may be that there are good reasons why this arbitrary limitation should be imposed, but I do not believe it.

Now, Mr. President, the 10 minutes upon the first amendment which I offered have expired. If the Senate will bear with me to discuss one or two other of these amendments, to which I think I am entitled under the rule to 10 minutes, I shall then leave the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will pardon the Chair, but we are proceeding under the unanimous-consent agreement, and the Senate can act upon only one amendment at a time.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I, of course, yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Can we not have the amendment read?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Not in my time.

Mr. NORRIS. It will not be taken out of the Senator's time. We are debating an amendment that has never been read.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am not confining myself simply to the amendment, as I have as yet said nothing whatever on the bill.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has expressed much better than I can my attitude on the public-land questions of the West, and I feel that it would be an imposition upon the Senate for me to go into that part of the discussion. I do not like this bill. I do not like a word of any bill that has in it leases of the public lands of the United States. Absent landlordism is just as offensive to me when exercised by the Government as it is to an Irish patriot when exercised against the lands of Ireland.

The West went on and developed these lands under liberal laws until a time came for this conservation idea. Sensible conservation has as warm a friend in both the Senators from Colorado and the other Western Senators, myself included, as any other one provision of law, but a conservation that means the absolute destruction of every right of a State is ruin to that State. I say here that in the early days of it my firm judgment is that, as far as the West is concerned, certain gentlemen engaged in the conservation of the West were playing about the same part in the development of that country that the Kaiser is playing now in the development of the world. They did not know what they were talking about.

As the Senator from Colorado says, with due respect to that great tribunal, how the Supreme Court of the United States ever decided the Utah case is beyond the comprehension of any lawyer off that bench, in my judgment. The United States owns the public lands of the United States, just exactly as any other proprietor owns his land.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Government, I say, owns it simply as any citizen would own his own land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do.

Mr. KING. Will not the Senator make this qualification, that aside from the lands which it leases as proprietor it holds merely as trust for the inhabitants of the country?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Of course, whenever the Government makes a reservation for purely governmental purposes it is clearly within the power of the Government to do it, and it ought to do it, and it ought to protect those lands from any sort of intrusion by anybody, but they hold fifty-odd per cent of the land of my State to-day, and the court in the Utah case decides that we can not force a right of way across the public domain, that we can not take out a water power, because the United States Government has segregated water-power sites.

The United States Government have no more interest in the nonnavigable streams of my State than in the open sea, and not as much, as my friend by my side [Mr. THOMAS] very well suggests. They have no interest on earth in them. Yet because they own the land on each side of it, which is so poor that nobody can settle it, they immediately proceed to create a power-site location. Then we can not use that power, the State can not use it, the thing that the State necessarily owns, because the Government owns the public land abutting on that stream. I think I will offer an amendment before we are through to give these water-power sites to the States in which they are located and see whether or not we can not develop the West. This, however, is by the way.

I do not like this bill. I do not like any bill that takes from any one of the States its right to the occupancy of the public land under the old law applying to it. I do not like the Government going into private business. I am opposed to it. But for the very reason suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], with the greatest possible reluctance and because it gives relief to men who plainly have no other, who appeal to me to forego that sentiment of mine against what I deem an outrage against the rights of every Western State, if I do not change my mind between now and 5 o'clock I shall vote for this bill. I do not like a line of it; I do not like the theory on which it is built. My State has neither of the products for which so many people are suffering, and if I vote for the bill it will be, as the Senator from Colorado suggests, because it gives some relief to men who ought to have much more relief than the bill gives them.

Mr. President, I wish I could see my way clear with the rest of the Western Senators and that we could all get together in one effort to see if we could not put them, even at this late day, on an equality with the other States. Under the Utah case they could stop the people from my State going from one county seat to another if they wanted to, if they passed over public land. The State is absolutely powerless to move in the line of its own development. Yet we run against conditions where so many people are suffering in States other than mine that I may possibly give my support to the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in the way of general observation, although we are under the 10-minute rule and supposed to be debating amendments.

I am opposed to the bill on general principles, and being opposed to it I shall vote against it. It has been my purpose to state more extendedly than I shall be permitted to do now under the rule under which we are proceeding the objections to the general leasing system.

The leasing system, so far as the public is concerned, is just as detrimental to the Western States as any system, in my judgment, in any wise heretofore connected with the title to the natural resources of those States. We are some three or four thousand miles from the seat of authority, and the leasing system means the taking over of our domestic concerns and our domestic affairs and operating them from Washington. The result of it would be that it would impose a burden upon the average citizen of the West which destroys initiative and prevents development, and will finally concentrate the natural resources of that country in one control, to wit, those who can afford to come here and secure the leases.

However, I am not going, Mr. President, into a general discussion of that, but I wish to make some general observations with reference to this particular bill. I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has said and as to the situation in which he finds himself by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I occupy somewhat that position myself mentally, but it has forced me to a different conclusion than the conclusion which the Senator from Colorado has reached.

Under the present condition of affairs, so far as I am concerned, I shall never vote for any bill here in the Senate again which has the effect of conveying even by lease these natural resources, such as oil, coal, and power, which are in their very nature monopolies. I am in favor from this time on of city, State, or Government ownership and operation of the natural resources, such as oil and power in our Western States. It does not make any difference, Mr. President, what clauses we may put into this bill which distinguish and discriminate between the small man and the large man, it will not be very long until the small man will wholly disappear and the monopolistic interests will control the situation. This will be true under the leasing system just as completely as under the entry system.

I am very anxious myself to see some amendment to sections 16 and 17, because I think they are due to those who, as independent operators, have entered that field and exploited it and developed it, and it will enable them to get some compensation for the efforts that they put forth and for their labor. But I am not deluding myself with the thought that they will long remain in that field or will long constitute a part of the developing force in the great oil fields of Wyoming. The very nature of the oil development will bring it within a very short time under the control of a very limited number of people, probably of one or two companies, and the only entity which can contend against the great monopolies which control these great natural resources day by day is the Government of the United States itself or the States. Hence, so far as I am concerned from this time, in view of the situation in which we find our resources, I am not willing to vote to donate or grant either in fee simple or by limited title these natural monopolies to private parties. I am convinced that the only way we can protect the situation and make these natural resources inure to the public good and constitute a real benefit to the mass of the people is by granting them to the States or by the Government holding them, and one or the other or, in some instances, both developing them, controlling them, and operating them. Whatever may be said as to public ownership generally, I am sure that these great oil, coal, and power possessions now belonging to the Government should be held and operated by the public for the public.

Mr. President, what has become of our power sites under the leasing system in so far as leases have been made? Where are they? Who is developing the power of the West, and who is controlling it, and who is getting the benefit of it? Has the leasing system changed one iota or the slightest the effect of this proposition upon the masses of the people? Is there any difference in the price which the people pay, or will there be any difference in the price which the people pay under a complete ownership or under a leasing system? The ultimate consumer will pay, in my judgment, finally, just as much for the use of his oil and for the use of his coal and for the use of his power under a leasing system as he will pay under an absolute ownership system, taking into consideration that we have a public utility commission whose business and whose power it is to fix rates that is especially true.

As to this bill, and I do not say this in criticism of anyone who is the author of it, its inevitable effect, its logical effect, will be worth $50,000,000 to two oil companies operating in the State of Wyoming. There is no way by which you can prevent it from being worth that amount to them if you grant a leasing system at all, in view of the physical facts which obtain now in the State of Wyoming.

The leasing system will not give the people any better use or greater benefit of these resources. I am therefore—and am compelled to be brief—for public ownership and operation of all this class of resources.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am somewhat surprised to learn the attitude of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I must say that I have heartily concurred in the statements that have been made by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] as to the manner of developing the public lands and particularly the natural resources of the Government. I believe that a leasing system will never be a success. It was predicted on the floor of the Senate time and again during the consideration of the Alaskan leasing bill that there would not be a single lease taken out. That has been verified. There is not a coal mine in Alaska that is being operated to-day under a leasing system. The reason is that when a man enters upon coal lands for the purpose of developing a mine that will produce he has to have capital, and it is not the capital that goes and makes the location. When he locates upon the land he has got to have a patent that the capitalists will lend money on, and when you present a Government lease that may be forfeited at any time, especially under such circumstances as have been referred to by the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Arizona, you can readily see that the capitalist will say, "No; we do not want to invest anything when our security is simply something that might be forfeited." That is the reason why they can not get money with which to buy machinery to open up a coal mine. The minute you refer to the fact that you have a lease title as security, immediately capitalists will say they can not consider it at all; but if the party gets a fee-simple title, he then has something upon which capitalists can depend. They know if the miners put a million dollars into modern machinery, which is necessary for the equipment of a good mine, that that security is going to be theirs in the event that the amount which they have loaned fails to be repaid.

Mr. President, I recognize the fact that it would be a very good thing—I do not mean financially—for the people if all these lands were transferred to the States; but I see no possibility of any such action. Our lands have been locked up for 15 or 20 years, and we are not getting any result from them. That situation has produced a monopoly upon the part of the people who acquired their lands before the withdrawal system was put in operation. It is for that reason that there must be some compromises in such legislation.

Perhaps some Senators remember that I have introduced bill after bill and have made a number of speeches in the Senate against the leasing system and in favor of the entry system. What I have stated in those speeches was true, and I believed every word which I stated at the time they were made; yet what have I accomplished, or what have we who have been trying to get these lands developed accomplished in the way of development? Nothing whatever. The withdrawal order on coal lands has been removed, but that did not remedy the situation, because upon a classification of such lands, which was made 10 or 15 years ago, the prices were placed upon them so high that nobody would take them up. Consequently there could be no inducement whatever to development.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] came to me one day and said: "You have been in favor of the entry system and the sale of coal lands." I said, "I have." He said, "The junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has believed in a leasing system." I said, "He has." He said, "You believe that there can be no development except on an entry system?" I said, "Yes." The Senator from New Mexico further said, "The Senator from Montana believes that there can be no development whatever under a purchase system. Why not enact both your bills, and thereby give the applicant for the land the option"? We three met. We exchanged suggestions; a bill was introduced and referred to the committee. We met a number of times relative to the matter, and our suggestions were carried out in a report, which was ratified by a vote of 10 to 1. The result is somebody has to make certain concessions. Believing that there will be no leasing system by the Federal Government, I am willing to test the question as to whether we are right that there will be no development whatever under the leasing system, and that consequently people will not take leases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired. The question is on the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the article "a" and to substitute the word "locations" for the word "location."

Mr. BORAH. I desire to make an inquiry. I thought the committee had some amendments pending.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] would like to be present when the amendments, of which that is the first that I offered some time ago, are acted upon. I offered two other amendments, however, to section 16, which I think are pertinent to be voted upon at the present time.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] offered several amendments, which went over on last Saturday. Those are committee amendments, and I had supposed that they were pending. Have they been adopted?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I think not. The regular way, of course, would be to first adopt committee amendments.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to this procedure, but I wondered if the committee amendments had been disposed of.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; they have not been. They were printed, and they are contained in the reprint of the bill, which is on the desk of each Senator. I think that perhaps they had better be first voted on. I should like to inquire whether or not we are operating under the 10-minute rule, Mr. President, instead of the 5-minute rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are operating under the 10-minute rule.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Had I consumed my 10 minutes?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The timekeeper so informed the Chair, and the Chair thought so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that the committee amendments be now taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Senator from Colorado must withdraw his amendment. The committee amendments were not formally offered; they could not be offered except one at a time. The Senator from Nevada stated that he had offered them in order that they might be printed and lie on the table and be subsequently considered; that he was not asking action on them. They were all offered at once, and a dozen amendments can not be offered to a bill at the same time. If the Senator from Colorado withdraws his amendment for the present the committee amendments will then be considered.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw it because of the absence at this time of the Senator from Utah from the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 12, before the word "of," at the beginning of the line, it is proposed to insert the words "by a claimant."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, on page 12, line 14, after the word "withdrawal," to insert the words "and who prior to such date had performed all acts necessary to a valid mining location thereof, except to make a discovery of oil."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, on page 12, line 15, to strike out the word "the" and to insert the word "such."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, on page 12, line 17, after the word "each," to insert the word "such."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, on page 25, line 6, to strike out the word "any" and to insert the words "more than a tenth."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Before that amendment is agreed to, I desire to state that the amendment was suggested by me, and there is also an amendment which was afterwards offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. Both those amendments seek to accomplish the same purpose. If, however, the Senator from South Dakota insists on his amendment I will withdraw my amendment, so that we may first act on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I can not quite agree with the Senator from Nevada that these two amendments mean the same thing, although his amendment may to some extent accomplish the purpose that I had in view in framing my amendment.

As I understand, the Senator from Nevada relies upon the potash bill as a precedent for the one-tenth provision contained in his amendment. The circumstances, it seems to me, are altogether different. In the potash bill there was no danger of a combination or a monopoly, such as would be found in the Middle West with the Standard Oil Co. No such condition existed there as exists here. Hence, I think that my amendment, giving the right to any number of patentees or lessees to form combination was necessary for the purpose of laying down pipe lines and for the purpose of building a refinery, is better than the Senator's amendment, and affords a better safeguard against monopolization than does the amendment of the Senator from Nevada. That is the way it appears to me.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have no pride in the authorship of the amendment. I adopted the formal expression because it had been debated in both Houses on a prior bill, and it was then decided by both the Senate and the House of Representatives that no lessee under the potash bill should hold a greater interest than one-tenth in any refinery or resales agency; but, as I have said, I used the language principally because it had heretofore been debated and adopted. I have no desire to have any contest over the question. I therefore ask leave to withdraw the amendment at the present time in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in lieu of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, after line 13, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any number of patentees or lessees under the provisions of this act from combining their several interests so far as may be necessary for the purpose of establishing and constructing a pipe line or lines, to be operated and used by them jointly in the transportation of oil from their several wells, or from constructing and carrying on the business of a refinery: Provided further, That any combination for such purpose or purposes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, on application to him for permission to form the same.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator proposing the amendment a question. If his amendment be adopted, supposing there should be a half dozen or more locators who desired to combine to build a pipe line—and in the same field there might be 50 or more locators who were not in that combination—is there anything that would obligate the constructors of that pipe line to carry the oil of the other operators through that pipe line?

Mr. STERLING. No; I will say to the Senator there is not; there is nothing in the amendment that would compel that pipe line to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator think that they ought to be compelled to do so?

Mr. STERLING. I thought that other locators might, under the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, make like combinations and build their own pipe lines.

Mr. SMOOT. That might be very expensive and no doubt unnecessary, I will say to the Senator. I am in favor of his amendment, but I do not think it goes far enough. I think that wherever there is a grant given to locators to combine for the purpose of constructing a pipe line for the carrying of oil, they should be compelled to carry the oil that may be offered by other producers in the same field.

Mr. BORAH. Are they not already common carriers under the interstate commerce law?

Mr. SMOOT. They are so under the interstate commerce law, but this amendment being passed after the enactment of that law, I do not know whether that law would affect the situation which might arise under the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. BORAH. I think they would still be common carriers.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be again reported. It was read hurriedly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be again stated.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. STERLING.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, I will state that I can see how under the phraseology of this amendment other locators might be excluded probably from the use of these pipe lines. That is not intended, and I suggest this as an amendment to my amendment: After the words "several wells," add "or from the wells of other patentees or lessees under this act." Then they would be common carriers under the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. All I want in this amendment is to provide that the pipe lines shall be common carriers, or that we should use language that would give all operators the absolute right to have their oil transported whether such declaration is made or not.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will permit me, I should like to suggest that there might be some doubt, and it seems to me there would be, as to whether these pipe lines would be common carriers, because the language under which they are authorized does not so specify. So, why not, instead of the amendment which the Senator has suggested, in line 3, on page 26, after the word "constructing," add the words "as common carriers," so that it will read "necessary for the purpose of establishing and constructing as common carriers a pipe line or lines," and so forth.

Would not that make it plain, then, that these pipe lines were common carriers? And of course, if they were common carriers, they could be utilized by others than their owners.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps the wording suggested by the Senator from Nebraska would cover the matter; but would it not make it a little more definite to say "for the purpose of establishing and constructing, hereafter to be deemed common carriers, a pipe line or lines"?

Mr. STERLING. How would it do to say "or from the wells of other lessees or patentees as common carriers"?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator feel that any attempt by the Federal Government to legislate with respect to that matter would be an encroachment upon the rights of the States? Most of the States have provided for the duties of common carriers within the States; and why should we now seek to legislate with respect to that matter? Our legislation here may run athwart the pathway of the legislation of the States. If there be a pipe line within a State, and the State law has declared a pipe line to be a common carrier, then obviously a person who desired to have his oil transported through the pipe line of that corporation, if it should refuse, would seek relief in the courts, and through the instrumentality of the public-utilities commission, if not through the courts, would secure the relief which he desired. It seems to me that we can safely leave that matter to the States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, some of the States may not have acted upon that question and may not have declared by State law that a pipe line is a common carrier. I can not say whether or not Wyoming and California have made such provision.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption there, I will suggest that pipe lines may cross State lines, so that the State law would not perhaps apply.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In order to enforce the unanimous-consent agreement and to keep some track of time, the Chair would like to know what amendment is pending before the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from South Dakota yielded to other Senators.

Mr. STERLING. I move as an amendment to the amendment offered by me the following: After the word "constructing," in line 3, on page 26, according to the reprint, add the words "as a common carrier," and then, after the word "wells," in line 6, on page 26 of the reprint, add the words "or from the wells of other lessees or patentees."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota relieves the situation somewhat, but, if I have not misconstrued the phraseology of sections 33 and 34, they will, unless they are much more materially modified, fill the penitentiaries of the West, and possibly of the East, with practically all of the people who now enjoy their liberty for the commission of what are now and always have been simple transactions of everyday life. These two sections were designed, I presume, to prevent monopoly. A man might as well try to win a horse race by putting handicaps on his own animal instead of that of his adversary as to try to prevent monopoly by such legislation. Now, let us see what they propose. As I have said, I may be mistaken regarding their purport. I have spent some anxious moments over them, however, and I think that the conclusion which I have reached is at least justified by the language employed. Section 33 reads:

SEC. 33. That no person, association, or corporation, except as herein provided, shall be permitted to take or hold any interest, as a stockholder or otherwise, in leases of any one of the deposits herein named and described, during the life of such leases covering in the aggregate an area greater than 2,560 acres, and any interest held in violation of this provision shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction, except that any such ownership or interest hereby forbidden, which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree, may be held for two years and not longer after its acquisition.

Section 34 is as follows:

SEC. 34. That no person, association, or corporation holding a lease under the provisions of this act shall, except as herein provided, hold any interest, direct or indirect, in any agency, corporate or otherwise, engaged in the resale of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, or sodium purchased from such lessee, or enter into any arrangement, agreement, or other device to enhance the price of such minerals or products, and any violation of the provisions of this section shall be ground for the forfeiture of the lease or interest held.

Then follows the penalty:

That any person who shall purchase, acquire, or hold any interest in leases of any one of the deposits herein named and described, except as herein provided, or who shall knowingly purchase, acquire, or hold any stock in a corporation having an interest in two or more such leases, except as herein provided, or who shall knowingly sell or transfer to one disqualified to purchase, or, except as in this act specifically provided, disqualified to acquire, any such interest, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $1,000.

The remainder of the section applies the penalty to directors, trustees, officers, or agents of a corporation in the following language:

That any director, trustee, officer, or agent of any corporation holding any interest in such a lease who, on behalf of such corporation, shall knowingly participate in the purchase of any interest in another lease of the same substance or deposit which such corporation is disqualified to take or to hold or in the sale or transfer of any such interest in any lease for the same substance or deposit held by such a corporation to any corporation or individual holding any interest in any similar lease under this act, except as herein authorized, shall be guilty of a felony, and shall be subject to imprisonment for a term of not exceeding three years or a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or both.

Now, let us analyze it. This is designed, as I understand, to prevent a monopoly in refining. My friend, the Senator from Idaho, may be inclined to purchase 10 shares of the John Smith Co., whose assets consist of one of these leases. The next day some friend of his may make him a present of 10 shares of the John Jones Co., which is operating another of the leases, and that heads him for the penitentiary, for he is a shareholder at once in two of these concerns and the penalty of the statute attaches. So if the owner of one of these leases shall become, however necessary it may be, interested in any agency that is designed to transport or to treat or to sell his product, he becomes at once a felon in the eyes of the law; and, if convicted, he must either go to the penitentiary and wear stripes for a certain number of months or pay $1,000 as a maximum fine.

We can but faintly realize the effect of a provision of that kind in a speculative community or among people who, entirely innocent of any wrong motive, acquire such interests in good faith and sometimes acquire them unwittingly. One man may present a friend with a small block of stock in one of his leases, and another friend having a similar lease may make him a present also of a stock interest in his lease. By these little acts of generosity they may send their friend to the penitentiary.

We are about to pass such a law on the theory that it will prevent a monopoly in refining. Why, Mr. President, it is difficult for me to reconcile these two sections with the known ability and character of the members of the committee which reported the bill. Prevent monopoly! Why, as one Senator has said, we might just as well under these sections attempt to arrest the law of gravitation. We may control the situation, as we tried to do in the Trade Commission act; but these two sections should go out, or they should be so materially modified as to remove the specter of the penitentiary from every citizen and from every lintel throughout the country. It is the most monstrous legislation, if I have correctly interpreted it, that I have ever been called upon to consider since I have been a Member of this body.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if he does not think the amendment proposed by me a while ago should not apply to section 33 as well as to section 34?

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment offered by the Senator is good so far as it goes; it will relieve men from the penalties of the act in the event they combine for the purpose of building a pipe line or a refinery; but suppose a man buys stock in his neighbor's company while owning one himself or owning an interest in another, then what becomes of him?

Mr. STERLING. I think perhaps my amendment could not be construed to apply to a case of that kind.

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment is all right, but the inherent difficulty arises from the language of the two sections. Certainly we do not want deliberately to penalize a man for buying stock in two concerns engaged in the same business because, forsooth, their assets consist of a leasehold interest of identical character—at least I do not. I shall probably vote for this bill, but I do not want to vote for a bill which will so operate that when I go home I will be confronted at the station by a mob of innocent stockholders insistently demanding an explanation of the legislation which has transformed them from decent citizens to prospective criminals. These two sections should be eliminated.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I submit a further amendment. I think there is a danger that section 33 might be so construed as to prevent the very combinations that are provided for in my amendment to section 34. Hence, I desire to amend the amendment so that in the reprint, beginning with line 25, at the bottom of page 25, it will read as follows:

Nothing contained herein nor in the last preceding section shall be construed—

And so forth. I move that amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, these are two entirely different questions. Section 33 is an absolute prohibition against one lessee holding an interest, either directly or indirectly, in more than 2,560 acres, and the Senator's provision seeks to provide for a combination of lessees in a greater amount than that. It seems to me it destroys the whole effect of section 33.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, my thought was that under the provisions of section 33 it might be held that lessees might not be able to combine their interests in their several holdings for the purpose of building a pipe line, and I wanted to prevent any such construction as that.

Mr. PITTMAN. The very object of section 33 is to prevent a combination of lessees. If you are going to permit a combination of lessees, then you are going to destroy the protection against monopoly.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator understand that the amendment to section 34, as I have offered it and as it has been read, does permit of a combination of lessees or patentees for the purpose of building a pipe line or for the purpose of building a refinery?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. That is what it is for, and it is to prevent a monopoly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; but not for the production of oil.

Mr. STERLING. It is to prevent monopoly in that part of the business which is most subject to monopoly—namely, the refining of oil, of course.

Mr. PITTMAN. The very object of section 34, in the first place, was to prevent a great many leases from being combined in a refining company, and it was to prevent a refining company from being the holder of innumerable leases. That was the object of it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? He has stated very clearly the object of the section. Suppose, under section 33, the Senator becomes a stockholder in a company holding a lease which I have secured, and also becomes a stockholder in a company owning a lease of a similar tract of land which the Senator from North Carolina has secured: Does he not come within the prohibitory clauses of the section?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. And will he not, if indicted and convicted, incur the consequences of the section?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator think that such legislation should be enacted by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the great trouble we have had with regard to our natural resources, as has been stated here on the floor, is the monopolization of them. We have got to do one of two things: We have either got to prohibit monopolization and punish monopolization, or we have got to take the position of the Senator from Idaho and have the Government not only own but operate all of them. I am not ready to go as far as the Senator from Idaho, because I believe that we can regulate it if we try to.

The committee has tried to regulate it. It has stated most emphatically that the extent of the interest of any individual in any lease shall be 2,560 acres, and it has also prohibited him from acquiring interests indirectly, because the prohibition would be ineffective unless it applied to indirect acquisition; and therefore the bill prohibits you from holding an interest in 100 corporations that own 100 different interests of 2,560 acres each.

Mr. THOMAS. It would seem that the Senator's remedy for monopoly is legislation that will put everybody in the penitentiary except the monopolist.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that the Senator is opposed to monopoly, but the suggestion he has made is not capable of being incorporated in legislation right now. As a matter of fact, if you destroy section 33, you throw down the bars, as was alleged by the Senator from Idaho heretofore.

Mr. THOMAS. And if you do not destroy it, hundreds and hundreds of innocent people, ignorant of the operation of this law, will be subjected to the pains and penalties of the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, that is the complaint against every criminal law, and always has been, and always will be. Unless you are going to limit the amount of acreage in which a man may be interested under this lease system, you are bound to have monopoly. We have attempted to limit it to 2,560 acres; and I say that the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is a destruction of section 33.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the more this bill is analyzed the more objectionable it will appear, not only to those who are familiar with the West and its needs, and the great problems with which this bill attempts to deal, but to all who appreciate the functions of the Federal Government and the limitations placed upon it and the rights and powers and prerogatives of the sovereign States. Little by little the Federal Government has encroached upon the States, but now the tendency is to practically obliterate State lines, extinguish the rights of the States, and concentrate all power in the Federal Government.

In times of war this tendency is always exaggerated. But even the imperative legislation demanded by the great war in which we are engaged does not warrant or justify in my mind many of the provisions of this bill. It was never intended that the Federal Government should enact a general penal code. Certainly it was not the intention of those who wrote the Constitution that there should be a superimposition of penal statutes enacted by Congress upon the States and to govern the conduct of citizens of the various States in their purely domestic and local affairs.

Here we find a provision that property acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for two years and not longer. In other words, the Federal Government is attempting to determine the question of the devolution of property, the manner in which it may be held, as well as the conditions attending its ownership. This legislation, as well as other provisions in the bill, in effect relate to purely domestic and local affairs. It has been held repeatedly by the Supreme Court of the United States that the Federal Government has no municipal control, that the States deal with the people within their borders, that their laws prescribe how property should be held, the uses to which it may be put, and so forth.

This bill further provides a criminal code in relation to domestic matters and in relation to transactions which may be purely intrastate in character.

Further supplementing the illustrations just submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], let me suggest a set of facts of this character: If the Senator from Nevada owns a share of stock in a corporation organized under the laws of his State, which corporation was engaged in the production of oil, and he purchased a share of stock in another corporation organized under the laws of his own State engaged in a similar business, he would be guilty of a felony and subject to punishment by the Federal courts. If he sold a share of stock in one of these corporations to his neighbor, he would be compelled to scrutinize with care his action lest his neighbor might own a share in a domestic corporation engaged in the oil business, and thus bring him under the condemnation of this bill. He would thus be guilty, even though the share of stock which he sold was in a corporation which produced only one barrel of oil per day or per year——

Mr. THOMAS. Or no oil at all.

Mr. KING. Or, as stated by the Senator, no oil at all. That is, if the Senator from Nevada owns a share of stock in a nonproductive corporation engaged in the oil business, he would be guilty of a felony if he sold that practically valueless share of stock to some individual who owned a share of stock in another corporation equally as nonproductive. And this would be so even though, as stated, the corporations were organized in the same State. It would also be an offense if the two corporations in the supposititious case just mentioned produced oil and the entire output was consumed within the State.

This bill attempts to regulate purely intrastate transactions, and enacts a penal statute with reference to matters that may be purely intrastate.

I submit that the provisions of sections 33 and 34 are tyrannous and oppressive in the highest degree. This bill will retard development of oil lands as well as coal lands. It is known that the oil business is exceedingly hazardous. It is really a gamble. Millions of dollars are expended in the search for oil without oil being discovered. Most of the oil wells have been driven by men of limited resources. They have organized corporations and have sold stock to a large number of people. In most instances the persons purchasing the stock knew that the enterprise was a hazard and that they were running a risk of losing the money paid for the stock.

It is known to all persons familiar with the oil business that many people purchase a few shares of stocks in a number of companies organized to sink wells, and that most wells are driven from the moneys derived from the sales of stock in small blocks to numerous persons. This bill will prevent the sale of stock to any great extent for the purposes mentioned. Hereafter men who have not considerable capital will not be the discoverers of oil. I make the prediction that this bill will drive the oil business into the hands of a comparatively few persons of large financial interests and will unquestionably result in the transportation and refining business, which is now a monopoly, being perpetuated as a monopoly. This bill will create monopolies and perpetuate monopolies.

Many people seem to entertain the view that oil production is in the hands of monopolists. I think the history of the oil business in the United States clearly proves that the production of oil has been by independent operators, and in the main by men of but small means. The Standard Oil Co. is not, and has not been, what might be called an oil producer. Its money has been made in the refining of oil. I think the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiary organizations produce less than 20 per cent of the oil of the United States, but they refine more than 70 per cent. The refining of oil is in the hands of a monopoly, but the production of oil is not controlled by a monopoly.

This bill will strengthen the grasp of the refining monopoly and it will increase the power of the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiary organizations as well as the Dutch Shell, referred to by the Senator from Nevada, in any efforts they may make to control the production of oil in this country.

This bill is a delusion and a snare. It is harmful to the best interests of the people. It will throttle and strangle competitive oil development. Unquestionably it is a blow at the Western States and places the yoke of bureaucracy and a tyrannous autocratic paternalism upon the new Commonwealths that have been so grossly discriminated against in the legislation and Executive orders of the past two decades.

I suggested in effect that the Standard Oil Co. was not a monopoly so far as oil production is concerned. While I do not profess much knowledge concerning the history of the oil industry of our Nation, my information is to the effect that the Standard Oil Co., and the organizations which it controls, have encouraged individuals and corporations to sink wells and produce oil. It and its subsidiary organizations, when the oil was produced, would then construct the pipe lines and the refineries and obtain control of the crude oil and also determine the prices of the finished product. These companies then became a monopoly in the transportation and in the refining business.

As illustrative of this situation I invite attention to a transaction with which many of the Senators are familiar. In 1896 certain leases were granted on the Osage Indian lands in Oklahoma. During 20 years, the term of the leases as I recall, about 75,000,000 barrels of oil were produced. The lessors got 5 per cent of the profits, the original lessees 2.3 per cent, and the sublessees 12.7 per cent. The Standard Oil Co., as the refiner, obtained 80 per cent. Or to put it in dollars, the lessors got for this oil $5,452,234.08, the original lessees $2,442,099.49, the sublessees $13,729,064.83, and the refining company—that is, the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiary organizations—got $86,250,000.

There were, no doubt, a large number of lessees and sublessees. These were the producers. The Standard Oil Co. did not compete in production; it only desired to control the transportation and the refining of the oil.

It seems very clear to me that this bill is improperly conceived and will result in frightful injustices and most baneful and injurious consequences. I can not conceive how people from the West can support this bill, and I sincerely hope that the Senator from Colorado, who has just voiced his opposition to the fundamental principles contained in this measure, will continue his opposition and with others vote against it.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] made a suggestion in regard to the cession of the public lands to the States in order that they might control the same. Sometime ago I introduced a bill providing for the cession to the States of the public lands. I will offer it to-day as a substitute for the pending measure. Of course, I understand that such a bill will not meet with favor, but I warn Senators that the present bill is a mistake; it will fasten a millstone around the neck of the West and will prove a burden which will be grievous to the Nation.

I regret that we are not in a frame of mind to enact wise and just legislation; that we have not the vision to deal with this question in a broad and statesmanlike manner. I desire to register my unalterable opposition to it and only regret my inability to defeat it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if an amendment is in order to the amendment, I should like to offer one at this time, my amendment being to strike from the bill sections 33 and 34.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is pending first.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I offer this as an amendment to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, the right exists to perfect the part to be stricken out before it is stricken out.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, while I do not agree with the Senator from Nevada with regard to the effect of the last amendment offered by me upon section 33, yet I think the main purpose of the amendment will be served by having it as an amendment to section 33 alone; and therefore I withdraw the amendment to the amendment last offered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let the amendment be stated as finally proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; let us try to find out what is before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. In section 34, on page 25, after line 13, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That nothing contained herein shall be construed to prevent any number of patentees or lessees under the provisions of this act from combining their several interests so far as may be necessary for the purpose of establishing and constructing, as a common carrier, a pipe line or lines to be operated and used by them jointly in the transportation of oil from their several wells or from the wells of other lessees or patentees under this act, or from constructing and carrying on the business of a refinery: Provided further, That any combination for such purpose or purposes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior on application to him for permission to form the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is one more committee amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 8, after the word "the," it is proposed to insert the words "transportation, refining, or."

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senate having agreed to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, I withdraw that.

Mr. BORAH. That ought to be line 18, anyhow, instead of line 8, ought it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; that is in harmony with the amendment. I ask for action on it, therefore.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I again renew my amendment to the pending amendment, to strike out all of sections 33 and 34.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The Chair understood first from the Senator from Nevada that he had withdrawn his amendment. Now the Chair understands that he has not withdrawn it. It is an amendment to perfect section 34, and therefore takes precedence of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I intended to offer it to the other amendment, but the Chair was too quick for me.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Nevada wants the Senate to adopt this amendment to his proposed amendment after the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PITTMAN. I feel that it is in perfect harmony with it.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it covers the same thing exactly, only the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota makes these transportation lines common carriers.

Mr. PITTMAN. The first amendment to that section offered by the Senator from Nevada is out by consent—that is, "more than one-tenth"—but the rest of it is more definite and explains the sales agencies. In other words, it reads now:

That no person, association, or corporation holding a lease under the provisions of this act shall, except as herein provided, hold any interest, direct or indirect, in any agency, corporate or otherwise, engaged in the transportation, refining, or resale of coal—

Except as provided in the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not see the necessity for that amendment after adopting the one offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PITTMAN. We have no prohibition in the section before the words "transportation" and "refining." I insist that it is in harmony with the section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 8, after the word "the" or before the word "resale" it is proposed to insert the words "transportation, refining, or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, Mr. President, I move, as an amendment to the bill, to strike out sections 33 and 34.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike from the bill sections 33 and 34, as amended.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am impelled to offer this amendment by reason of the very frank admission of the Senator having charge of the bill as to what will be the consequences of its enactment into law.

In response to my criticism the Senator said that it was one which was made to every criminal statute, and I suppose that is true. It is one that ought to be made to every statute which seeks to transform into a felony a perfectly innocent act and an act which is performed thousands of times daily by citizens all over the country.

Why, Mr. President, there is no more moral obloquy in the purchase of a share of stock at present than in the purchase of a horse or any other article of personal property. It is a recognized, legitimate transaction, and one in which men indulge with greater and greater frequency as time passes. These two sections at one fell stroke, for the ostensible and very creditable purpose of preventing a monopoly, transforms an innocent and lawful and in many cases necessary transaction into one of the gravest of crimes. No matter what may be the exigency which provokes such a remedial statute, I am unable to give it the sanction of my consent. I would rather have monopoly, with all of its consequences, than to seek to prevent it by a measure which necessarily operates to the disadvantage, the humiliation, and the disgrace of thousands upon thousands of innocent men and women. Nor does this one even tend to prevent the evil at which it is aimed.

Why, Mr. President, in addition to depriving locators of their property acquired under the law, this so-called measure of relief goes further and opens the doors of the penitentiaries of the Nation not only to those who are here seeking relief but to all of the citizens of the United States everywhere, if, forsooth, they should knowingly or innocently expend one dollar in the purchase of a share of stock in one company and another dollar in the purchase of a share of stock in another company, both of which are operating leases under this bill. That, to my mind, is not only indefensible but monstrous.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. I would rather see the public domain tied up forever than released under such conditions. It is un-American; it is unjustifiable from any standpoint from which we approach the so-called land question. If it could have the effect in practical operation of preventing this monopoly, there might be some justification for it; but it will not. Its only possible effect will be to subject hundreds of thousands of our citizens to the humiliation of a criminal trial and to probable conviction for felony.

I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will take up the matter in my own time, so as not to consume the Senator's time.

Mr. THOMAS. I am nearly through. Therefore, Mr. President, I have offered this amendment. I think it ought to be adopted. I do not believe language is capable of so transforming or modifying these sections as to relieve them from the peril which is embodied in both. After we have enacted the bill into law, and perceive the effect of its operation, I very much fear that those who are proposing it here will be the first to clamor for its repeal.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nevada stated this morning that sections 33 and 34 had no reference to sections 16 and 17. If we strike out sections 33 and 34, what limitation is there anywhere in the bill to prevent, to any extent, monopoly of these oil lands?

Mr. THOMAS. The limitations exist in those sections. They exist in one section because of the limited amount of ground to which it can possibly be applied. They exist in the other section with regard to the number of locations and the extent to which they can be recognized. But I would rather have no location at all than to place a limitation like this upon any of these sections.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; you limit the amount of ground; but suppose the stockholders combine? What is there to prevent a complete combination of all the stockholders or owners of a piece of land?

Mr. THOMAS. Nothing, and we can legislate here until doomsday, and some method of evasion of what we may do will be found. The Senator knows that.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is what I was seeking to develop. As I said a while ago, it does not make any difference what we do in this bill, the result will be that three or four people will control the whole thing.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes. We dissolved the Standard Oil Co. some time ago. It now has a dozen heads where it had only one, and it is a great deal harder to cut off either of the heads it now has than to have decapitated it in the first instance.

I believe in remedial legislation and restrictive legislation. I want to say here that the Senator from Idaho to-day has proposed the only possible outcome—that is to say, the substitution of public for private monopoly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I did state this morning that sections 33 and 34 were intended for the purpose of preventing the monopolization of these oil fields. There is not any question about it. There are only two courses that can be taken unless we want to cease to protect against monopoly. We must either have the Government operate the oil fields and coal lands or we must place such restrictions upon the operation of the oil fields and coal lands as the intelligence of the legislator may dictate.

Our committee have decided to try to develop these oil fields through individual effort and to throw around that development such restrictions as will prevent monopoly as far as possible. That policy was adopted four years ago in this body when it passed a bill similar to this. That policy has been adopted twice in the House of Representatives when it passed the bill and sent it to this body. This kind of protection is the result of the work of both the committee of the Senate and the committee of the House with regard to public lands. It is their judgment after hearings on numerous occasions. It is the result of the labors of the lawyers and the statesmen on those committees. Now, it may not prevent monopoly; it may be true that we are powerless to prevent monopoly; but I am not ready at this time to admit it. If I were ready to admit that to be the fact, I would instantly be in favor of the Government not only owning all the oil and coal lands but actually operating them.

If I had the view of this matter that the Senator from Colorado has, I would not vote for any bill except a bill to furnish the United States Government sufficient money to take the oil out of the ground and to take the coal out of the ground and distribute them where they are needed; but as I am not prepared to go that far, as I still believe that punishment can prevent the commission of crime to such an extent as to permit the people to operate without Government interference in everything——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question on the line of the monopoly of which he speaks?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. From the Senator's experience with the West, does he know of anything that could possibly be worse than a Government monopoly?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know that there is very much distinction between monopolies, but I would prefer a Government monopoly to an individual monopoly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would not.

Mr. PITTMAN. But I want to say right now, as I said before, that these two sections of the bill include the principal protection that the committee has offered against the monopolization of this land. So far as section 16 is concerned, monopolization under that section is protected by physical facts. It is protected by physical facts, because there are only a few cases where wells have been sunk down to oil; but in the leases that are to be let under this bill on 6,000,000 acres of land there is no protection if you strike out sections 33 and 34.

In other words, you open the door for the Standard Oil Co. or the Royal Dutch Shell Co., or both of them together, to acquire every lease that the United States Government executes under the bill, and to hold and operate it. I am satisfied, and the committee were satisfied, that 2,560 acres of oil lands are enough to sustain a good, sound, substantial company.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree to that.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Colorado agrees with me. Therefore we should prohibit the acquisition, directly or indirectly, of any more.

The Senator's speech was largely directed to a misconception of what the Senator from Nevada said or the Senator from Nevada inadvertently misstated what he knew with regard to the bill. Here is the situation. The bill says:

> That any person who shall purchase, acquire, or hold any interest in leases of any one of the deposits herein named and described, except as herein provided, or who shall knowingly purchase, acquire, or hold any stock in a corporation having an interest in two or more such leases, except as herein provided, or who shall knowingly sell or transfer to one disqualified to purchase, or, except as in this act specifically provided, disqualified to acquire, any such interest, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $1,000.

In other words, the statement of the Senator from Colorado that one might be punished who innocently purchased stock in a corporation that is interested in more than one is a condition that can not arise under the statement of the bill. Innocent purchasers of stock or innocent purchasers of an interest at least are absolutely protected under the bill. The bill only punishes those who knowingly and willfully in violation of law attempt to monopolize the public domain under the provisions of the act. I certainly hope that the bill will not be destroyed by striking out these provisions.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator before he takes his seat if the word "knowingly" helps the situation. If I purchase 10 shares of stock in one company to-day, I do it knowingly. If I purchase 10 shares to-morrow in a prohibited company, I do it knowingly.

Mr. PITTMAN. The question is as to knowledge.

Mr. THOMAS. The intent is absent from the expression of the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Who has knowledge of the fact?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not object to the limitation of 2,560 acres. What I object to is the punishment which follows if one or more individuals acquire small stock in two of these companies.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the word "knowingly" does not import knowledge, then the Senator can suggest an amendment to that section.

Mr. THOMAS. It imports knowledge but does not import willfulness.

Mr. PITTMAN. But you are striking out all the safeguards against monopoly. If it does not, then the language of this section is sufficient. If the Senator will offer an amendment at that point the committee will be glad to accept it if it makes the language clearer.

Mr. BORAH. If we are through with the debate I wish to call for a quorum. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	McNary	Simmons
Beckham	James	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smith, Md.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] on public business.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is still detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee are in session on the railroad bill and beg to state that if necessary for a quorum they will return to the Chamber; if not, they ask that they may be excused so that they may continue the hearing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. OWEN. I send to the desk the following proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a pending amendment now.

Mr. OWEN. I beg the Chair's pardon; I was not aware of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to strike out sections 33 and 34 as amended.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not prevail. One charge that has been made against the administration of the public lands has been the fact that there have been created monopolies, and it is claimed that by reason of that condition there ought to be some supervision upon the part of the Federal Government. That has been the strength of what might be termed the conservation movement, and it has created a condition of affairs that has been very detrimental to the Western States. Here are two sections that propose to remedy that condition or tendency toward monopoly as much as they can, and the striking out of them would throw down the bars and say there shall be no law against combinations. It seems to me the adoption of the amendment would prevent the bill from ever becoming a law.

Sections 33 and 34, the part to which the Senator from Colorado, my colleague, has objected, prohibit combination in the ownership of stock in companies that own oil leases. The usual form of owning and having a combination in several leases or several pieces of property is by means of stock. That is the very way by which it is done, and to strike out this provision that proposes to prohibit the ownership of stock or knowingly acquiring the ownership of stock in any other company, it seems to me would simply permit any one combination to own 90 per cent of every leasing company or ownership company. That being the case there would be no safeguard whatever, there would be no protection whatever, against monopoly.

Mr. President, we have had sections that have been proposed in various forms. Some have said that the ownership of a stockholder of one company in that of another company owning a lease should be limited to one-tenth. That will not do, because 10 men in one company then could each acquire stock in all the other companies in the field and consequently produce a monopolization of it. The only way that that combination can be prevented is by the retention of sections 33 and 34.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is it not the whole purpose of the committee in the adoption of those two sections to prevent the Standard Oil Co. and the Dutch Shell Co. from owning every one of these leases?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Or any other company. That is what it is.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Or any other company; and the purpose is to prevent the absolute monopoly of these leases by rich companies. The only inhibition is against you or me or anybody else going in and owning shares in every one of the companies.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We are prohibited because by that prohibitory statute they are prohibited. That is the reason. On that account, it seems to me, it would be very wrong to strike out these sections.

I want to say in addition that the attempt has been made to have small leases, and under this bill quite a large lease is permitted, 2,560 acres. That is done for the very purpose of letting a company that has capital and means to develop oil lands to the highest extent to have such control that they can make a business success of it. That is the reason why, instead of being limited to 20 acres, or a combination of eight men to acquire 160 acres, under the present placer act, they are permitted to prospect for and get the fruit practically of their discovery to the extent of 2,560 acres. Of course a great many competing companies can exist under that large area. The House committee does not consent to that. They make only 640 acres the limit. We believe that there should be a larger area so that there would be companies that could compete with the large companies and thereby make a competition that would be of use and benefit to the consumer.

Now, we find that if you prevent the statute from going into effect which says that the owner of stock in one company can not acquire stock in another company, one company could own the entire field in Wyoming or in any other State in the Union where there is public land. So while there may be some inconvenience in the case of stockholders as a result, on the other hand, not to have stockholders at all, not to have corporations; they would have to be all individuals. Individuals do not like to go into business where there is an unlimited liability. For that reason they can sacrifice some of their right or transfer some of their right of purchasing stock in other companies in order to prevent the monopoly under which people have been very much aggrieved because the consumer is held up by the large company.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that some modification might be made, but to strike out the only two provisions in the bill relating to the prevention of monopoly, the prevention of the stockholders of one company owning all the oil lands in a field. If these sections are stricken out, there is no land of the public domain but what might be acquired by one company.

So I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment offered by my colleague, the Senator from Colorado, will be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following amendment.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to have my proposed amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It shall be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out sections 16 and 17 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 16. That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, prior to July 3, 1910, honestly and in good faith for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas, and thereupon commenced discovery work thereon, and thereafter prosecuted such work to a discovery of oil or gas, shall be entitled to lease from the United States any producing oil or gas well resulting from such work, at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced therefrom, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof but without the right to drill any other or additional wells: Provided, That such claimant shall first pay to the United States an amount equal to not less than the value of one-eighth of all the oil and gas already produced from such well: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any well involved in any suit brought by the United States, or in any application for patent, unless within 90 days after the approval of this act the claimant shall relinquish to the United States all rights claimed by him in such suit or application: And provided further, That all such leases shall be made and the amount to be paid for oil and gas already produced shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator to explain the difference between his amendment and the provisions that he seeks to strike out. The amendment has not been printed?

Mr. OWEN. No; it has not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is difficult to follow it, so as to see what the difference is.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, as I understand the controversy over the question of validating the claims on various leases for oil and gas which arose under the old placer act, it is substantially that while some of these claimants were justified in some of the claims to have been bona fide, there are many of them who are charged with having made dummy entries and perpetrated various frauds by which to put themselves in the attitude of a just claim and asking to have Congress protect their equities. It is now a matter before the court, and many of these cases are pending.

The proposed amendment which I have offered undertakes to protect the equity of the man who in good faith under the old placer law made a claim and prosecuted it with the intention of developing oil and actually carrying out the purpose of making a development even if it was done after the act of withdrawal, provided it was done before the time fixed in the proposed amendment, 1910. The purpose of it is to protect the man who had an actual equity, and draw a clear line of demarcation between that man with an equity and the man who has no equity but who violated the purposes of the act of Congress, who violated good ethics, in his attempt to monopolize the public domain for speculative purposes; and it does draw a clear line of demarcation between the two.

I think the proposed act in sections 16 and 17 is broader than it should be, because it proposes to give to a claimant who prior to July 3, 1910, had performed all acts necessary to a valid mining location except to make a discovery of oil. The exception, of course, is vital, because he could only acquire a right if he did actually make a discovery of oil under that statute.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. If there was no discovery made, then the bill proposes that he shall have no relief at all.

Mr. OWEN. I understand some of them did actually make discovery.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think the Standard Oil made a discovery prior to 1910.

Mr. OWEN. I do not know what the evidence discloses, but I have had so many statements made with regard to these claims——

Mr. PITTMAN. Those who made discovery prior to 1910 do not need any relief, because they had title.

Mr. OWEN. If they are given relief they would not have to prosecute a case in court, and those who went on after the time when they were inhibited by the Government, I think, are not justified in seeking this character of relief.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not had a chance to examine the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, but if his explanation of the amendment is correct, then you are going to penalize the man who has spent his money to develop an oil field in which he was unfortunate enough not to find oil; but if a man was lucky enough to find oil you are going to give him the right to a lease. If a man before the withdrawal in 1910 discovered oil there is no court on earth and no power on earth that can take his title away from him; he is entitled to the land.

If the amendment the Senator offers is adopted it seems to me we might just as well pass no bill at all and just leave the law as it is to-day, because it simply means that a man who did have a title and a right to the land of course could not lease it, and nobody is going to lease land who has not an absolute title to it. If I understand the amendment, that is the effect of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I interpret the language contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, it narrows rather than broadens the ground upon which relief will be granted to certain claimants of oil lands. I think there can be no question but what the proposed amendment would not protect locators who had gone upon oil lands in good faith, but who had failed to remain in actual possession because of being driven off by stronger parties, who in some instances used the process of the courts to aid them in ousting the original locators and in keeping the latter out of possession. Neither would the amendment protect locators who respected the President's proclamation and deserted from work, even though they expended many thousands of dollars upon their respective claims. Other situations suggest themselves, not covered by the suggested amendment. It is too restricted and should be defeated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I have an opportunity, unless sections 16 and 17 are materially amended, I shall vote to strike them from the bill. But I can not vote for this amendment, because the substitute for sections 16 and 17, I think, in all probability would not accomplish what I am sure the Senator has in mind. After hearing it read from the desk, I am not willing to vote for the substitute, although I would like to vote to strike out sections 16 and 17.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the difficulty is in examining amendments that are offered here and are not printed. It makes it almost impossible for a person to know exactly the purport or meaning of the amendment. For that reason it seems to me we ought to be very careful in deviating from the report of a committee that has examined this question for at least four years, presenting sections that have been approved by the action of the House of Representatives and also by committees of the Senate. It seems to me that we ought to be careful in adopting an amendment unless it is clearly understood. I believe in view of the action of the committee in approving a certain measure, especially when, as I understand, the Interior Department has approved those very sections, we should not change it unless the amendment is plain and palpably right. So it seems to me we should adhere to the sections as presented by the committee.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I think the Senator from Colorado did not understand the scope of the amendment, nor did the Senator from Nevada, as to the period of time. The language is—

> That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, prior to July 3, 1910—

That was entered prior to that time—> honestly and in good faith for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas, and thereupon commenced discovery work thereon, and thereafter prosecuted such work.

That is, after the period of July 3, 1910, prosecuted the work and found oil after that date. It does not limit it to the finding of oil prior to July 3, 1910, but it limits it to the entry prior to July 3, 1910, and who thereafter found oil.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the difference, then, between them? It seems to me that sections 16 and 17 provide for just such conditions as those, although probably not in the same language. I do not believe in changing language that has been studied and which has been repeated in bills for four years by substituting something else, unless it is so manifestly clear that all agree the amendment is wise.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the difference between the two propositions is that in line 16, on page 15, the words "except to make a discovery" are not included in the proposition of the Senator from Oklahoma. In other words, no matter how diligently he has acted and how much money a locator has expended to discover oil, unless he has actually discovered it, under the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma he is not entitled to a lease.

Mr. OWEN. I would suggest to the Senator, Mr. President, that a man who in seven years has not made any discovery has not been diligent.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Oklahoma makes that statement offhand, without knowing the conditions existing in the Wyoming oil fields.

Mr. OWEN. I think that a man who knows anything about the oil fields—and the State of Oklahoma produces as much oil as any State in the Union——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators can only speak once on this amendment. The Chair will enforce the unanimous-consent agreement. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, referring back to sections 33 and 34, I offer the following amendment: On page 24, line 17, of the old print of the bill, I move to strike out the words "except as herein provided" and to insert "except as provided in sections 16 and 17 of this act."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I suggest to my colleague that he leave in the words "except as" and that he simply move to strike out the words "herein provided" and insert in lieu thereof the words "provided in sections 16 and 17 of this act." It is a limitation of the act and makes more specific what is excepted.

Mr. THOMAS. I modify my amendment as suggested by my colleague.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. In section 34, page 25, line 5, after the word "act," I move to insert the words "other than leases issued under the provisions of sections 16 and 17 thereof," and to strike out the words "except as herein provided," on line 6. It is virtually the same amendment which I have just previously offered.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no objection that I can see to that amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I endeavored to get recognition before the other amendment was voted upon, but evidently I did not make myself heard by the Chair. This amendment, however, involves the same question. The purpose of it is to prevent there being any limitation upon the quantity of land which may be acquired by these so-called equitable claimants, and the amendment now offered is to remove any restriction as to the manner in which those lands may be operated by these so-called equitable claimants. In my opinion, it was unwise to have adopted the amendment to section 16, for the reason that it enlarges the area which one concern may control, and it enlarges it beyond the point where we are willing to permit for the future citizens or associations of the country to acquire these lands. In other words, we propose by this bill to limit the amount of land that any individual or corporation may be interested in for the future to 2,560 acres; but we have a class of claimants who went upon these lands in violation of law, in good faith, it is true, under a misconstruction of the law, and we are proposing to permit those who are trespassers upon the public domain to acquire greater rights through a so-called claim of equity than we are willing to permit the individual of the country, who now goes upon the land in good faith and under the law, to acquire.

In my judgment, there should be some restriction, and the restriction offered by the Senator from Colorado, which has just been adopted to section 16, removes that limitation. I am perfectly willing that there shall be relief granted to the people who have actually developed oil in that country under legal advice that they had a right to do so, although it has been decided that they had no such right; I am willing to grant to them relief; but I am not willing to grant to them relief beyond the point where we are willing to permit the citizen of the country to go in a legal way. I think this amendment should be voted down, and I think the vote upon the other amendment should be reconsidered.

I think we are doing an injustice here to people who in the future under the law may go upon the public domain and seek to develop oil. We are limiting them; but we put no limitation upon those who have gone upon the public domain in violation of the law, even though in good faith, and developed oil. I can not conceive upon what principle Senators favor giving to these claimants rights beyond those which we are willing to permit citizens to have who go there in a legal way, simply because the others have gone there in an illegal way, although acting in good faith.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my purpose in offering these amendments is to mitigate in some degree those provisions of sections 33 and 34 to which I unsuccessfully called attention a few moments ago. I do not conceive that any of the men concerned in sections 16 and 17 went upon the public domain of the United States illegally, except in the most technical sense. The President of the United States himself, the author of the withdrawal order of September, 1909, expressed doubt as to his power to make that order, and the Supreme Court of the United States, in sustaining it, virtually held that acts of usurpation, if persisted in and repeated, became sanctified by time into law. These men took a chance, it is true, and the Supreme Court decided against them, but the two sections, 16 and 17, apply to other locations as well as to those to which the Senator from New Mexico refers.

So far as section 16 is concerned, the limitations placed upon the acreage involved by the actual physical conditions in Wyoming, are such that an extreme combination could not exceed 5,000 acres; and if the limitations of sections 33 and 34 apply to them, it will be impossible for them to avoid that monopoly of refinement which has been so eloquently inveighed against here.

So far as section 17 is concerned, the locations there described represent the rights of persons who on the 1st day of August, 1917, were bona fide occupants or claimants of oil or gas bearing lands open to appropriation as such under existing law. Certainly, those locations could not be called illegal, nor can the locators themselves be accused of disregarding the withdrawal order of the President. They refer to locations made upon the unappropriated public domain which had not been withdrawn and which were, therefore, open to occupation under the statutes of the United States, the only need of relief being that no discoveries had yet been made upon them.

I think, therefore, that it is perfectly right and proper that these remedial sections, framed to relieve men from existing conditions, should not be made subject to the penal clauses and limitations of the other two sections. I might add that, so far as I am able to judge from a somewhat cursory reading of the bill several times, the exceptions exist anyway. I merely offer the amendments to clarify the situation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Colorado a question. As I understand the Senator's amendment—I was called out at the moment he offered it—to section 33 consisted in striking out the words "herein provided" and inserting the words "other than leases issued under the provisions of sections 16 and 17 thereof."

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. In what respect does that change the bill from its present form as construed by the committee itself?

Mr. THOMAS. I think it merely expresses more clearly what the language embodied in sections 33 and 34 means anyway.

Mr. BORAH. It has been stated over and over again here by those in charge of the bill that sections 33 and 34 do not apply to section 16.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; but the Senator and myself have had some experience with department constructions of remedial statutes.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, under the law as it now exists and as it existed prior to the withdrawal order of President Taft a company has a right to locate as many claims as it wanted to. It could locate a million claims if it so desired. That was a right which had been given; it was a matter of right that would accrue in a patent. There came, however, the sweeping order withdrawing such lands from entry where the discovery of oil had not been made. The owner of a mining claim drives four stakes on every 20 acres of land; he does not have to record his certificate, and probably would not record the certificate until 30 days thereafter; at least he is allowed that right by law. He must, however, make a reasonable effort to discover oil, and that is generally done by a derrick. With the drill he is supposed to keep on until he discovers oil. If he does not discover oil, he will have no more title to that land than would I—not a particle more. Consequently, after these men went upon the public lands and sunk wells for oil, when the order was issued some of them had spent, as I have understood, as high as fifty thousand and in several instances as much as $100,000.

I have not any doubt, as explained by the Senator from Nevada, that President Taft never intended that those who had not discovered oil at the time of the issuance of that order should be cut off; in fact, the Pickett Act seemed to sanction the same view. Suppose a company having under law acquired 2,560 acres of land, had acquired a patent and a lease, and when this order was promulgated had spent $50,000 or $100,000 in a well, is it possible that we should legislate that such a company should not be entitled to get the additional well upon which they had spent that sum of money and let any locator without any work acquire the same? Is that right? Such a policy would produce no development. The object of this statute is to produce development; and it seems to me in framing this law those people should be given that right.

I believe in a limitation, but it should be equitably made. There must be a limitation as to the amount of land which can be acquired when a man begins operation. It is not fair to say, after he has his claim in process of development, "We shall not allow you to acquire any more than a certain fixed amount, and all your work will go to the first man who asks for a permit on that land."

It is possible that the House of Representatives, acting on this bill, will send back their bill, which may be to the effect that only 640 acres may be acquired by lease. I do not know where they are located, but I have no doubt that there are any number of companies in the United States which have more than 640 acres of land, and perhaps there are a number of them which have more than 2,560 acres. To say that they shall be cut off, when such a provision was not in the law when they began operations, it seems to me would be doing them an injustice and not granting them relief at all. Let us fix a maximum in the law, so that people who locate may know the limits as to which they may acquire land, and let them acquire that amount; but to say, after a man has made his entry, that he may be cut down by a law subsequently passed by Congress it seems to me would be unwise and unfair.

For those reasons, Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by my colleague will be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado. [Putting the question.]

Mr. KENDRICK. I wish to offer the several amendments, respectively, which I send to the desk.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, what became of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not ruled.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would like to have the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know on the vote taken whether it was carried or not. All in favor of the amendment will rise.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the question on the amendment to section 34?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The amendment is to insert the words "other than leases issued under the provisions of sections 16 and 17."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those in favor of the amendment will rise. [A pause.] Those opposed to the amendment will rise. [A pause.] The amendment is adopted.

The first amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 11, on page 8, line 21, it is proposed to strike out the words "if the same are situated within 20 miles of any producing oil or gas well," and in lieu thereof to insert "if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the same are situated within the geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I desire to express opposition to that amendment. I do not think it is determinative at all. It provides for a determination by the geologic structure, which I believe would be a very difficult matter for a prospector to ascertain, and I am satisfied that, if left to some of the bureaus, they might include a whole State in a geologic structure. I think that it is to the interest of the prospector to have some limitation as to where he may prospect and how much land he may get within certain areas. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, in explanation of the amendment I wish to say that whatever the situation may be in other sections of the country it is rather easy to determine the limitations of any oil structure in my State. This section clearly intends to govern the acreage in a prospector's permit according to the distance from producing oil structures. As an indication of the injustice of the language of the bill as drawn I will point out the fact that what has been spoken of here as the Teapot Dome is within 5 miles of the largest oil-producing field in my State, but it is an entirely separate structure. Under such circumstances the section as it at present stands would limit the prospector, drilling in an entirely separate structure, to one-fourth of the maximum area, which is clearly contrary to the spirit of the bill. In my judgment, it would be a mistake to make such a provision, and I hope that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Secretary to restate the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator from Wyoming, the amendment is intended as a limitation?

Mr. KENDRICK. A limitation that carries with it a restriction of the amount of land that a prospector may have under a prospector's permit. Under the section as it now stands, if the land is within, say, 19¾ miles of a producing well, he can only have 640 acres, as I understand, while if it is 20 miles away he may have 2,560 acres. The truth of the matter is, that it is intended to restrict prospecting to territory that has not been proved, as contradistinguished from oil structures that have already been proved as such.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether or not the phrase "the geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field" is easily ascertained? A man by going on the public domain and seeing a derrick, of course, can measure 20 miles and know where the line is between the 640-acre entry and the 2,560-acre entry; but I am not sufficiently familiar with the oil fields to know whether the geologic structure is readily ascertainable and is delineated on the ground. It would not be so objectionable if it were delineated and visible, so that the prospector could find it. The only question in my mind is whether the use of the words "geologic structure" would not confuse him. If the geologic structure is plain and visible, or can be ascertained readily, I am in favor of the proposal; but if it can not, I feel that the best way to do would be to make distance in miles the guide; and if 20 miles is too much, we can make it less than 20, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, in the territory of the larger oil fields in my State there have been frequently expensive wells sunk just outside of the structure where there were evident lines indicating the outline of the structure. Such wells have proved an entirely new oil structure, sometimes one after the other in succession. As I have already said, the oil structures are clearly defined, and some of them are very much nearer and closer together than 20 miles. Therefore I think that any prospecting done within an entirely new territory should be done on a basis of equality.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is there on the surface of the ground to indicate where these zones or geologic structures are?

Mr. KENDRICK. In my State there are clearly defined walls in almost every instance.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Visible to the eye, on the surface?

Mr. KENDRICK. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. So that they can be ascertained by the prospector without having to come down to Washington to find out about them?

Mr. KENDRICK. Yes; and they are known not only to the local but to the Federal geologists. There is only a question of expending the money to determine the presence of oil. In many cases these structures are broken; the oil has wasted away; and the fact of the presence of oil is only demonstrated by a heavy outlay of money, as the Senator from Colorado has already suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, on page 14, in the proviso at the close of section 16——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The Senator from Wyoming sent to the desk several amendments. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 11, on page 8, line 24, it is proposed to strike out the words "if the same are situated over 20 miles from any producing oil or gas well" and insert "if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the same are not situated within the geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The SECRETARY. In section 17, on page 14, line 12, it is proposed to strike out the words "August, 1917," and insert in lieu thereof "January, 1918," so as to read:

That the rights of any person who on the 1st day of January, 1918, was, and ever since has been, a bona fide occupant—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 12, page 10, line 3, after the words "unsurveyed lands," it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following: "or at his election the said permittee shall be entitled to a lease for the entire area described in his permit for a term of 20 years, such lease to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee, after first deducting from the gross production such oil or gas as may be used in development and operating such land, of a one-eighth royalty of the product of said land, or the value thereof, and the payment in advance of a rental of $1 per acre per annum thereafter during the continuance of the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited on the royalty for that year, and such other reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, as a substitute for the amendment just read, I offer the one which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted, the Senator from South Dakota moves to insert the following:

Provided, That said permittee shall be given a preference right to lease the remaining and unpatented lands embraced within the limits of his permit upon the same terms and conditions as provided for other leases, or said permittee may, at his election, with like preference right and upon like conditions, become the lessee of the entire tract embraced within said permit, instead of receiving a patent for any part thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word in regard to this amendment. It is somewhat broader than the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. It gives the patentee a preference right to lease the remainder of the tract if he desires. It gives him a preference right to lease it. It also allows him, at his election, instead of taking a patent for any portion, to lease the entire tract covered by his permit.

I think the rest of the language of the amendment puts the lessee in this case upon exactly the same footing as other original lessees provided for in the bill, and I believe the amendment is a little preferable to that of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I like the first part of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota, but I do not like the latter part of it. This measure is one that has been considered very carefully by the committee, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not like to have the leasing system extended to one acre more than is necessary in order to get through a working bill. For that reason I feel that where the proposition is as contained in the bill itself—namely, that the applicant shall have a right for his discovery to 160 acres in one instance and to one-fourth of the other premises that may be issued to him—that is something definite and fair, and you will find that in every instance the well would be sunk on the land of which the man is the owner.

While I would not vote against the bill on this account, yet where we have a system that we hope will work and a provision with relation to what shall be given to a man for his discovery it seems to me we ought to let that system prevail all the way through. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I wish to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota in lieu of the one which I offered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the bill as reported authorizes the giving of a permit for anyone to prospect for oil and gas. He has within the limits of that permit two years to prospect; and if he discovers oil, then he gets as a reward for the discovery a patent to one-fourth of the land embraced in his permit. It may be 640 acres or it may be 2,560 acres, depending upon the location.

It seems to me that that reward is sufficient. He gets that absolutely. He gets an absolute patent for it. The balance of land within that permit is then leased by the Secretary of the Interior. Of course it is known then that oil has been discovered, and probably, as a rule, it would be valuable.

As I understand this amendment, the effect of it is this: Instead of confining the man to a patent for one-fourth of the land embraced within his permit it gives it all to him. That is really the effect of it. He gets a lease for it. In the other case he would only get a patent for one-fourth, and the balance would be leased, if the Secretary saw fit, in a competitive way. He would put it up and lease it to the highest bidder, very likely. He is given authority under the bill to do that. If this amendment prevails, that is what it will do. In other words, instead of giving the man title in fee to one-fourth of the land embraced within his permit, it gives him a lease of the whole thing for 20 years.

Mr. BORAH. Upon the same conditions that he leases the balance.

Mr. NORRIS. No; if the Senator will turn to——

Mr. BORAH. I have not the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota before me.

Mr. NORRIS. I am referring now to the bill in another place. It tells how the balance of the land under that permit, after oil has been discovered, shall be leased. It gives to the Secretary of the Interior the right to lease it under competitive bidding. It is in section 15, I think, on page 11, where provision is made that after one-fourth of the land embraced in the man's permit has been given to him in fee simple the balance of the land can be leased, the bill says—

By the Secretary of the Interior, through competitive bidding or such other methods as he may adopt by general regulations, in areas not exceeding 2,560 acres and in tracts which shall not exceed in length two and one-half times their width, such leases to be conditioned—

And so forth.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand this amendment, its effect is no other than to give the original discoverer a preference right to a lease upon the same terms and conditions upon which the Secretary would have granted a lease to anybody else under this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, if that means that he may put it up at competitive bidding and permit this man to take it at the highest bid——

Mr. BORAH. This is what it says:

Provided, That said permittee shall be given a preference right to lease the remaining and unpatented lands embraced within the limits of his permit upon the same terms and conditions as provided for other leases, or said permittee may, at his election—

And so forth.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska pardon me for a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know how much time I have left.

The VICE PRESIDENT. About a minute.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish this statement, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

The language I have read is found on page 15. If that goes in as it is now, it is going to be necessary to amend the bill, to strike out this language that I have read; otherwise, it will be absolutely inconsistent. I do not see how the Secretary of the Interior could put that up at competitive bidding and then say, "Here is one man who is going to have it if he wants to."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, under the language of the amendment he could not do that. The amendment is intended to give that man a preference right to the remainder of the tract covered by his permit, or a preference right to lease the whole of the tract instead of taking a patent for part of it, if he so desires.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. STERLING. That is the object of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not a misconception as to what the amendment means.

Mr. STERLING. Otherwise the lease would be subject to the same terms and conditions as other leases.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but that language means that the balance of the land embraced in the permit could not be put up at competitive bidding.

Mr. STERLING. I grant that.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all I contend. It seems to me that that means that the man who gets this permit has the exclusive right to stay on 2,560 acres of land for two years and keep everybody else off of it. He gets that permit to prospect, and he gets oil. If he gets oil, under the bill as it is drawn now, he is given one-quarter of the land contained in his permit in fee simple, and he selects it himself. It must be in compact form, but he takes a quarter of it. If this amendment prevails, instead of that happening when he discovers oil, he gets it all. So it seems to me that so far as practical purposes are concerned you may just as well say, when you give the permit to a man: "We will give you two years to decide whether you want this land or not, and if you decide within two years that you want it, we will lease it to you. You will get everything there is in it, and if at the end of two years you think you do not want it you can give it up and pay no more attention to it, but during that time you have the exclusive right, and everybody else must be kept off."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just this word in regard to this amendment:

One thing that I have had in view here is what we are all interested in, I suppose, and that is the production of oil, and the production of oil as far as possible free from monopoly or free from one interest getting control. I have thought that the man who made the exploration, who looked over the land and who made the discovery, did the work, and paid out the money, making, after all, a proposition that was more or less problematical, when he takes his patent for 160 acres in the one case or 640 acres in the other case, ought to be entitled to a preference right to the balance of the 640 acres if the land is within 20 miles of a known oil or gas well, or 2,560 acres if the land is more than 20 miles from an oil or a gas well. I think he should be entitled to that preference. He knows the land better than anybody else; he knows the possibilities of that land; and I think it will tend more to the production of oil to give the man who has made this investigation and this discovery a preference right than it otherwise would.

That is the sole object I have in offering this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota and accepted by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also, on page 10, line 4, after the word "patent," insert the words "or lease."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 10, after the word "patent," insert the words "or lease."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, of the old print, in section 13, the last words in the section, after the word "terminate," strike out the words "but he may become a lessee of the other lands described in his permit."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether that language should not be kept in the bill, so that if the prospector elects to take his patent to the one-fourth, he may be permitted to lease the balance of it and be upon equal terms with anybody else?

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is absolutely right.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator insist upon his amendment?

Mr. KENDRICK. I withdraw the amendment just read. The last three, if I remember right, refer to leases.

The SECRETARY. Amend section 15, on page 11, line 8, after the word "patented," by inserting the words "or leased."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, after the word "patent," add the words "or lease."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 18, strike out the words "two or more such."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Wait, please. What is that—page 25?

Mr. KENDRICK. I withdraw that amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, on page 14, in line 9, I move to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$500."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 9, it is proposed to strike out "$1,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$500."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Washington that the amount carried in this section was suggested by the Delegate from Alaska. The object of it is to show that the man had expended a large amount of money, and had been continuously expending it for a certain time, showing his good faith in prosecuting his claim. If we should make the amount too small, it might let anybody come in and claim the benefits of the statute, whereas, in the case of the withdrawal, he wanted and the committee wanted something to show that there was an effort on the part of the applicant to keep continuously at work until he got a discovery. On that account it was difficult to say that he did not get his discovery at that time; and a substitute was offered, making it a thousand dollars, which would show that the man had exercised good faith in trying to get his discovery; and the committee thought that a man who would spend as much as a thousand dollars in endeavoring to get it should be protected.

Up in Alaska the climate is often so cold that they have to desist from work, and strictly and literally under the placer mining act the man has not any claim at all. He is subject to be "jumped," according to the laws of the United States, and there ought to be some——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to know whether the Senator from Colorado is using my time or his own?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He is using yours.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not yield further to the Senator if he is using my time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply wanted to say this about the amendment:

As I understand the law, before the withdrawals were made it was this: That a person could get a patent for these lands in Alaska upon proof that he had made improvements of the value of $500. Now, there ought not to be more required to get a claim under this law than there was to get a patent to the land, and that is the sole purpose of reducing this to $500. While I would not say that the Delegate from Alaska had told me this, I had understood that he was desirous of having this change made.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that he is under a misapprehension as to the amount it was necessary to expend. You have got to expend money often to the amount of $50,000 before you make a discovery. It is not like, after you get a discovery, doing $500 worth of work annually; and for that reason it seems to me there ought to be a good, substantial amount required for the purpose of showing his good faith.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say that if I have been misinformed as to the law—and I have not had time to look it up—I agree with the Senator. I do not want to have any amount in here that will not require a showing of good faith in securing these claims.

Before my time expires I want to say that I have three amendments pending on page 2 which I shall not have time to discuss, as the time for discussion will close in 10 minutes. They are simply to insert the words "or Territory" in section 2; in other words, to make the provisions of this act, with reference to coal, apply to Alaska as well as to the coal fields of the continental part of the United States. It seems to me there can not be any objection to that.

I am not going to take any further time. I simply want that to be kept in mind when the amendments are submitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, at the end of section 43, on line 19, insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, however, That in order to assist in the production of oil to meet the present emergency, pending the final determination of a right to a patent to any oil or gas lands, or the actual granting of a lease upon oil or gas lands, as herein provided, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to permit increased production of oil under the terms of agreements authorized under the provisions of said act Approved August 25, 1914, which act is hereby continued in force for such purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator having the bill in charge that that is simply allowing the act of August 25, 1914, the temporary leasing act, to continue in force after the passage of this act, if it becomes a law, until the time when the land is actually leased by the Government.

Mr. PITTMAN. In other words, it is to take care of the hiatus between the operation of the two acts.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the amendment just offered by the Senator from Utah, as follows:

In order to assist in the production of oil to meet the present emergency pending the final determination of a right to a patent to any oil or gas lands, or the actual granting of a lease upon oil or gas lands, as herein provided, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to permit production of oil to continue under the terms of existing agreements authorized under the provisions of said act approved August 25, 1914.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not see what difference there is between the two amendments.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There is quite a difference. In the first place, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah authorizes an increased production, and in my opinion it also authorizes the making of new agreements under the act of August 25, 1914; and I do not believe that should be done. As to agreements which are in existence now, I am quite agreed that they should be continued in force until this bill becomes operative and until the parties have an opportunity to transfer their rights under the act of August, 1914, to their rights under this bill, but I do not believe that a new agreement should be entered into, or that any increased production should be permitted. It seems to me that if they go ahead under the agreements that they have now, they ought to be satisfied, and then come in under the provisions of this bill.

I therefore offer this amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only difference between the two amendments is that my proposed amendment will allow an increase of production of oil that is so badly needed now. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico is exactly the same with the exception of the allowance of an agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the producer to produce more oil until the land that is to be leased is leased out under the terms of the pending bill, if it becomes a law.

I think my amendment is far better than limiting the production as the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico does.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it seems to me that the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah permits a much broader construction than that based upon the amendment by himself. The language of his amendment is:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to permit increased production of oil under the terms of agreements authorized under the provisions of said act approved August 25, 1914—

And so forth. He uses the words "under the terms of agreements authorized." If that does not mean that the Secretary has authority to execute new agreements, then I am incapable of understanding that language, and not only to execute new agreements but to modify existing agreements so as to authorize the sinking of new wells and increasing their production.

It seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah goes far beyond what he wants, and the purpose of my substitute is to limit the transaction in express language, so that the agreements may go ahead just as they are now but no further until they bring themselves within the provisions of this law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] to the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, lines 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, it is proposed to strike out all of the following words: "If the claim was initiated within less than five years prior to the withdrawal, and such claimant had performed a reasonable amount of work preparatory and essential to the sinking of a well or wells, and who because of and in obedience to such order desisted from the prosecution of work for the development of such claim."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in explanation of that amendment I want to say that the words were put in, so I have been informed, for the purpose of taking care of the locator who located prior to the withdrawal order and who had assisted in work after the second order was issued. I think that whoever inserted the words did not take time to consider what effect these words really would have upon just such honest locators.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PITTMAN. The committee did give very careful attention to that, and it was a subject of considerable debate there with representatives of the Department of the Interior. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to take my time. With those words stricken out, it would read:

> And any person who at the time of any withdrawal order heretofore made was a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas bearing lands within such withdrawn area, other than lands reserved for the use of the Navy, and who has performed all acts necessary to a valid mining location thereof, except to make a discovery, shall have a preference right to lease the same under the provisions of this act.

If those words remain in the bill, the honest locator will be in many cases deprived of the privilege of leasing the land. If they go out, the dishonest locator will have a chance to get those lands as against the man who is entitled to the lease. It does not apply to any locator who has complied with the law and done his annual assessment work and all that is required of him under existing law.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 5 o'clock has arrived. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer the following amendment to come at the end of section 17.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 17, on page 15, at the end of line 22, insert:

> Provided, however, That no claimant who has been guilty of fraud in the location of any oil claims or gas-bearing lands shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section, nor shall his assignee or lessee be entitled thereto unless he affirmatively shows that prior to the passage of this act he purchased such lands in good faith, for a valuable consideration and without actual knowledge of such fraud.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 19, strike out the word "diligent" and insert, after the word "work," the following words: "without unreasonable delay"; and, in line 22, strike out the word "diligent" and in lieu thereof insert the word "said."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 14, line 20, after the word "gas," I move to insert the words "which work may be done on said location successively."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer the amendment to which I referred a moment ago: On page 2, lines 6, 7, and 10, after the word "State," in three places, I move to insert the words "or Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, after section 44, insert a new section, as follows:

> SEC. 45. That hereafter no public lands of the United States containing minerals shall be withdrawn by Executive proclamation or otherwise, and no reserve of any character or description, covering or including within its limits any mineral lands of the United States, shall be created or established except by act of Congress. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this section are hereby repealed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, at the end of section 6, insert a new section, as follows:

> SEC. 7. That where, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, the public interest will be benefited thereby, he is authorized to exchange noncontiguous bodies of public coal lands for privately owned coal lands, similarly situated, of approximately equal character and value, to such an extent and in such manner that thereafter the lands of the United States and those in private ownership shall each form single, compact, workable bodies or units: Provided, That nothing herein shall authorize the issuance, or treatment, of the privileges herein granted as script or assignable rights or privileges. In consummation of the exchanges herein authorized the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to receive and record conveyances covering privately owned lands and to issue patents covering lands of the United States exchanged therefor.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, lines 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, strike out the following words: "and such claimant had performed a reasonable amount of work preparatory and essential to the sinking of a well or wells, and who because of and in obedience to such order desisted from the prosecution of work for the development of such claim."

Mr. PITTMAN. A point of order. I think that amendment has just been acted upon.

Mr. PENROSE. It is in a different order.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is clearly out of order. The same amendment, to the same intent and purpose, was presented by the Senator from Utah and was defeated.

Mr. PENROSE. It is an amendment of narrower scope, I think, than that of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. PITTMAN. It was an amendment in about this language.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us have a vote on it, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it was voted on once, but there is not any harm in having it voted on again. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The committee adopted an amendment at the end of section 43 inserting "except as provided in sections 16 and 17 of this act." I desire to give notice that in the Senate——

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to give notice of a motion to disagree to the amendment offered which was adopted in Committee of the Whole and at the end of section 43, if it is in order, I should like to move to strike out the words adopted in Committee of the Whole and at the end of the section insert other words.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a unanimous-consent agreement here that certainly can be understood, and it is not to discuss amendments further.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I should like to give the notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to reserve the amendment for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I reserve it.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following amendment. On page 15, line 5, I move to strike out "a," where it occurs before the word "valid," and, in the same line, to strike out the word "location" and insert "locations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On page 12, in section 16, line 21, after the word "withdrawal," I move to insert the words "not within a naval petroleum reserve."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment. I did not catch it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am stating it from the latest print of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is impossible for the Secretary to get it in that way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In the original print, on page 12, section 16, at the end of line 14, after the word "withdrawal," I move to insert the words "and not within a naval petroleum reserve."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In section 3 of the bill, page 4, line 16, I move to strike out the words "outside of the Territory of Alaska."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move to strike out section 2 of the bill, which relates to the sale of coal land.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the following amendment. I have not had time to indicate where the amendment will come in, as I have just written it, but it should be inserted after the word "thereof," on line 18, page 12.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 18, after the words "any subdivision thereof," insert "and not exceeding in the aggregate 640 acres, if in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior the same are situated within the geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field, or 2,560 acres if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the same are not situated within the geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the bill.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the public lands, property of the United States, within the several States, which have not been acquired or reserved for the public or special uses of the Government of the United States, together with all rights, jurisdiction, privileges, and sovereignty appertaining thereto, or heretofore exercised or enjoyed by the Government of the United States with respect thereto, are hereby ceded, granted, and confirmed severally to the particular States within the territorial boundaries of which such unreserved public lands may severally lie and be situated.

SEC. 2. That there is excepted from this grant all particular tracts of land which have been entered pursuant to law, and for which the rights of entrymen or claimants may have been initiated, vested, or accrued. Upon the relinquishment, however, of the right of the claimant or entryman to any such lands the same shall be subject to the operation of the grant made by this act.

SEC. 3. That the grant made by this act shall take effect as to the lands within any particular State when the legislature of such State shall by resolution accept the grant made by this act and shall deposit such resolution with the Secretary of the Interior. Resolutions of acceptance shall be made within four years after the date of the approval of this act.

Upon the receipt of a resolution of acceptance from a particular State the Secretary of the Interior shall deliver to such State such maps, records, books, and documents, or certified copies thereof, as may be necessary or convenient for the enjoyment, control, use, administration, or disposition of such lands.

SEC. 4. That the grant hereby made shall be subject to the right of holders of outstanding land script, heretofore issued by the United States, to locate such lands in satisfaction of such script; but such locations shall be made before the lands herein granted shall pass to private proprietors.

SEC. 5. That all laws relating to the entry of public lands within the several States are hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to Alaska or to the Hawaiian or Philippine Islands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to move an amendment to the amendment. After the words "United States," in line 6, I move to insert "and which are not included within forest reserves."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the amendment on page 3, line 13, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 13, after the word "lands," it is proposed to insert the words "entered after the passage of this act."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KIRBY. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert the following:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to mine and develop oil, gas, and coal on any lands belonging to the United States, and to operate the wells and mines under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, when the public exigency, in his discretion, may require that it shall be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to further amendment. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has reserved a vote on one amendment. The question is on concurring in all of the amendments save the one reserved by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask to reserve the last amendment, which I have proposed—to strike out section 2 of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was lost. The Senator from Washington can again offer it in the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It was lost; but I ask to reserve a separate vote upon the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can not reserve a vote on an amendment which has been rejected; but he can offer it again in the Senate. The question is on concurring in all of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, save the amendment on which the Senator from New Mexico has asked a separate vote. They are concurred in, without objection. The Senator from New Mexico asks a separate vote upon an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 33, page 24, line 17, as in Committee of the Whole, the Senate agreed to an amendment to strike out the words "herein provided,' and to insert the words "provided in sections 16 and 17 of this act."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the Senate disagree to that amendment, to strike out the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, and at the end of the section to insert:

The provisions of sections 16 and 17 of this act shall be subject to the limitations of this section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not possible to disagree to this amendment, but the Senate can concur in it. Later on the Senator can offer his amendment. The question is on concurring in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I move to strike out section 2 of the bill, which is the section authorizing the sale of all the coal lands of the United States in all the States and Territories.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay." I desire to state, while on my feet, that my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when Mr. GOFF's name was called.) I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I am informed that if present he would vote in the affirmative on this question. I shall therefore cast my vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is absent. I believe he is in favor of the general principles of the pending bill; but being in doubt as to how he would vote on the final passage of the measure as amended to-day, I shall refrain from voting.

Mr. STONE (when Mr. REED's name was called). My colleague [Mr. REED] is necessarily absent on business. He is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. WOLCOTT (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of public business.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). May I ask whether or not the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. WALSH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who has a pair with me, has announced that pair. If he is now present I want my vote recorded in the affirmative; and, if not, I want the pair to stand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania is not here.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. Has the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. REED. I requested my colleague [Mr. STONE] to announce my absence, but I got through with my affairs and have been enabled to return to the Chamber. I desire to state that I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. If he were present and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of sickness.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; and

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 32, as follows:

SUPPLY OF PRINT PAPER.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of paper at a fair price, and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I understand that the action of the Senate makes the joint resolution, called up by the Senator from Arizona, the unfinished business. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be the unfinished business if it is not taken out of the category of unfinished business by something else.

Mr. STONE. Oh, it could be displaced by motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Yes; by taking up something else; but ordinarily it is the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is if the Senate adjourns now.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I am told there are numerous appointments pending, sent in by the President, some of importance, which should be referred, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 35 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 8, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Look down from Thy throne of grace, O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, with compassion upon our infirmities. We are weak. Thou art mighty. We are finite. Thou art Infinite.

Help us to fix our minds upon the Eternals, with a grim determination to follow where they lead, amid the conflicting forces, the unholy strife, the international struggle into which we have been reluctantly forced.

Grant that we may put all our energy, strength, and courage into it, that liberty, truth, justice, righteousness may obtain.

That we, with our allies, under Thy guidance, may establish a world-wide peace.

That all the nations of all the world may be permitted to pursue the peaceful vocations of life to the glory and honor of Thy Holy Name, in Christ Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 4, was read and approved.

WAR IN EUROPE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, let me say by way of preface to my remarks that I have received word that the French ministry of war is sending to the House a large relief map in plaster of Paris showing the front in detail, and that later, after it has arrived, if any Member cares to have me do so I should be glad then to answer questions in detail relative to the problems on the front.

May I add that, as I have tried to compact within the hour allotted to me a review of the problem in Europe as those of us who went over there have seen it, I shall be glad if Members of the House will defer any questions until after I have concluded?

This war, like other long-drawn conflicts, falls into chapters of events. Such a chapter came to an end when Russia collapsed and America declared war. Russia went out of the war in the spring of 1917, while America will not go into it in earnest until the spring of 1919. There is in war, as in peace, a distinction between forms and facts. Russia has not made peace, but she no longer fights. America has declared war, but she has not begun to fight. We must see now that if Germany is not yet victorious neither are we winning the war.

The military task was never more simple nor more difficult than it is to-day. I have not seen Russia this year, but I have talked with Russians who represented the revolutionary government until anarchy supplanted it; I have talked with European socialists who went on official missions to Petrograd, with European statesmen who knew all that men could learn of Russia from messengers and dispatches, and among them I met but one who believed that we might hope for a Russian effort against the enemy this year or next. Russia is so disordered that if she can not make war there is also hope that she may not be able to make peace, to supply the Hohenzollern and Hapsburg autocracies with food and labor to fight Russia's old allies and America; but if Russian radicals failed directly to help our enemies, still it was they who chiefly contributed to the unhappy events in Italy by releasing German guns and divisions, together with Hungarian divisions, for service on the western front.

"Our anvil is gone," the greatest of the active commanders among the allies said to me. "To disintegrate the enemy forces without it we shall have to hammer all the harder. If you had come in before Russia went out, we should have finished this horror in a short year. If you had been ready when you came in, your pressure would have begun before Russia's disintegration was complete and Germany had increased her forces on the front." I quote this, not in the spirit of recrimination but to emphasize what I have to say later about the great responsibility which rests upon our still inadequate organization for the war.

All through the spring and summer Germany was on the defensive in the western line. She had won nothing from Switzerland to the Channel, but, on the contrary, had suffered reverses and terrible losses of human material. Her enemies, at last, not only had her outmanned, but in a smaller but appreciable degree outgunned. Never did the strategic genius of the German general staff shine more clearly than when they resumed at sea, or rather under the sea, the offensive which they lost on land. Whether it succeed or fail, barbarous though it may be, the submarine offensive was a powerful flank attack. Germany was failing in the main theater; she struck at her enemies on their left flank, struck at the source of the power of England, the most formidable of her adversaries, formidable in wealth and numbers; struck at great England, unconquerable in undiminished reserves of moral energy and courage. It was a hazardous business, justified in German minds by their contempt for our moral fiber and by their knowledge of our military weakness. We joined our little sea force to England's greater forces to fight the submarines. It is too soon to say that we have mastered them. They may be improved; they may be better equipped to combat destroyers; their cruising radius may be increased; it may be that the rougher waters and shorter days of winter rather than the activities of their adversaries are responsible for the falling losses in merchant ships. At all events, during the late summer and early autumn the German public, like the German staff, saw that the submarines had failed in their full promise for this year. Then the imperial staff struck their adversaries again, this time on the right flank, in Italy. There is no mystery about that blow. In order to understand it we have only accurately to estimate the weakness and the strength of Italy, her achievement, and her failure, and the responsibility which we share with her European allies for her recent defeat. Italy, strong in man power but weak in all other resources, had done well. Some of her troops had been proved the equal of any in the French and British Armies. She had driven the Austro-Hungarian forces slowly eastward in the face of the great natural obstacles. All observers praised the organization with which she maintained her front in an incomparably difficult country. You must bear in mind that Italy labored under great handicaps.

In a war which is primarily industrial, Italy producing no iron and no coal, received from abroad even less than her normal imports. Her shell factories, which should have been working night and day, were working but part time. In spite of her lack of war material she pushed the enemy to the north in the Trentino and forced him eastward on the road which runs past Trieste to Laibach. She was seeking the old Napoleonic route to the heart of the Hapsburg monarchy. Ah! If she had been supplied with the resources to have driven through it! When I was on that front, Trieste was before our eyes. There were but two barriers between us and the highway to the plains beyond. The sons of the Roman road builders had woven over the rocky and precipitous desert a network of splendid highways the like of which are not to be seen on this continent. Along those highways, for miles, in iron pipes, they carried water for the parched armies and compressed air for the tools to drive galleries, to drill out tunnels, to cut roads across the faces of sheer cliffs. But for lack of ammunition her advance was stopped.

The Austrians were weakening. Italian officers told me of the capture of Turks among the prisoners, Turks summoned by the imperial German staff to the help of faltering Austria. As Italy pushed painfully toward the eastern edge of the desert country her difficulties increased. Her advance had been stopped because she lacked shells. For want of shells and guns her long flank on the north was weak. When I was there Hungarian divisions of real worth, together with German guns and German divisions from the Russian front, were being assembled for the drive which the Italians even then anticipated. They knew that they were in danger.

Sir, people were troubled by our course. They asked why we had joined hands with France and Britain and not with them, whose ideals and purposes were the same as those of the other western democracies. They asked why we had differentiated between the modern Hohenzollern autocracy and the more ancient, more obscurantist, more reactionary, and more tyrannical Hapsburg.

Italy expected the attack, but she did not look for the cowardice and treason of some of her divisions, which had been corrupted by the imperial spy system developed—in Italy as in America—while Italy stood by and watched the other democracies fight. They threw down their guns, those divisions, and Italy with her line broken had to fall back to the Piave.

There is a little satisfaction to be gained from the knowledge that the imperial staff achieved no great strategic success in Italy when they drove their enemies back to the line of the Piave. They made a political foray primarily for its moral effect and to relieve the pressure in the main theater of the war. Both these results they accomplished. They cured Austria-Hungary of despair. They marched Italian prisoners through the streets of Berlin and restored the faltering faith of the German people in the invincibility of the Hohenzollern. They compelled the British and French to detach divisions and guns from the western line, where they were gaining, to assist the Italians in the plain of the Po.

If America and the allies can profit by the lesson, we may yet count the German drive into Italy as a disguised blessing. Every thinking creature can now see, what too few saw before, that the front from the Adriatic to the channel is a common front. [Applause.] It is 700 hundred miles long. Three hundred miles of it lie between the Alps and the Adriatic; 400 miles between the channel and the Alps.

There are about 7 Italians under arms for every 10 men in the combined French and British armies in France and Flanders, so that the number of men is about equally proportioned to the lengths of the two great sections of the western line, but there is a great disparity in the distribution of guns. Even before the Italians lost a third or so of their cannon, the enemy on the Italian front faced less than one-quarter as many guns as he faced in the hands of the British and the French.

If America and the allies can learn anything from the past, if America awakens and does her full duty in the manufacture of vast numbers of cannon, Italy with her millions of infantry can be armed by us with the great weapons necessary to repeat on the Piave what transpired on the Marne. [Applause.]

When the drive into Italy was checked, for simple and cogent reasons, the imperial staff turned from Italy to France.

So far the submarines have failed to accomplish all that the imperial staff hoped of them, but the attack in Italy did very nearly all that was expected of it. Now, with unremitting energy, the imperial staff is assembling its forces to take the initiative against the French and British Armies in the main theater, where a real decision must be had if there is to be any. They intend to win before we can make ready.

Mr. Speaker, they know that in France there is a minority which, believing that we bluffed before we declared war, believes or fears that we may prove bluffers still. The imperial staff must strive to induce France to make peace on that score—the score that America will not make ready in time. That is the reason why the front from the Alps to the channel has assumed a greater importance than at any time since the battle of Verdun.

There is no military activity in the Vosges. So much of the front as lies south of the sharp salient of St. Mihiel has been quiet. One-third of the whole line is held by the British, against whom the Germans have mustered nearly as many divisions as there are opposed to the French. In passing, I may venture to remind you that there is a direct relation between the frequency of attack by the British as compared with the French and the greater concentration of men and guns on the shorter British line.

You have noted all through the summer a series of French and British successes. With a single exception the successes followed intensive artillery preparation, of which they were the direct result. If I venture to refer to certain of my own observations on the British and French fronts in some detail it is because I there saw the terrain of the two recent battles which exemplify the usual and the exceptional in modern attack. I traveled along the line upon which the British effected their advance toward Cambrai. The line before Cambrai was quiet, save for the singing of an occasional shell passing overhead. The monotony of an apparent stalemate was relieved only by occasional trench raids.

To the north the greater part of the British forces in guns and men had been pounding for months, while, as I have said, the French recently had made a savage attack to the south. Thus the German line before Cambrai had been drawn thin in the effort of the imperial staff to accumulate reserves to check the French to the south and the British to the north. Other reserves were not to be spared, for they had been dispatched to Italy. Then, when the attention of the whole world was held by the German thrust in Italy, Byng's infantry, with their tanks, in the thick mist of the autumn dawn burst through the thin line of sleeping Germans. It was a surprise; it was splendid; it was in keeping with the finest traditions of the British Army, but, as Gen. Maurice, chief of the British military intelligence in London, pointed out, it was only the long bombardment below and above Cambrai that made possible Byng's dash forward.

A day or two after the news of the sudden British advance some anonymous expert in Washington was responsible for the published statement that we were planning to win this war with masses of infantry. Infantry there must be in great numbers. Men will bleed and men will die, but every man who has lived on that bloody line will say that with guns enough you can win this war without the terrible losses of the past, that without the guns you will lose thousands and you may lose the war.

In contrast to the drive for Cambrai stands out the bloody check which the French suffered last April. It is hard to learn the exact truth. Apparently the commander in chief (since disgraced), yielding to political pressure, thrust his infantry forward against the height of the Chemin des Dames without adequate artillery preparation. Then, when news of the subsequent losses reached the politicians, at their instance the general in chief precipitately and prematurely halted the attack. It was those fruitless losses before we came into the conflict which darkened the spirit and quenched the hopes of our friends in the Republic across the seas.

How different it was this autumn. I had been running from Verdun toward Soissons. Gen. Petain, the commander and chief of the French armies, sent for me to learn if I had profited by the special facilities afforded me for observation. I told him that from the lips of his principal commanders, as well as from what I had seen and heard in Italy, I had come to realize that this was a vast industry in which we were engaged and that big guns were the tools of the trade. I said that therefore I wanted to see with my own eyes on as large a scale as possible an artillery attack. He promised that it should be so. He did not tell me where, nor that it was to be the greatest bombardment of the war. He told me to return to Paris and wait. There had been bloody losses and no success in the spring; there had been no adequate preparation.

The last battle of the Chemin des Dames was planned in July to be fought in October. The French had laid well nigh a thousand miles of broad and narrow gauge track to bring up the great guns and the munitions for their service. They had brought in 110 freight loads of high explosives. There was a cannon for every 3 or 4 yards of the front attacked. For every 2 infantrymen employed in that action there were 3 men engaged in the service of the artillery.

We set out very early from the French great headquarters for the front along a highway checked with traffic; motor-driven or motor-drawn trucks, heavily carrying forward supplies of ammunition, horse-drawn light artillery, food convoys, field kitchens, stretcher bearers, ambulances, battalions and brigades, African blacks from the Senegal, yellow-skinned Asiatics from Annam and Cochin China, bronzed tribesmen of Morocco, soldiers from every Province of dauntless France. At intervals, and each at a little distance from the grinding roads, there were the headquarters of the commander of the army of that particular front, of an army corps on that sector, each differing from the other only in size, each housed in a quiet villa. Every such headquarters was linked to the other commands by wires, so that each commander could communicate with his chief or follow and direct every move under him, with his eyes on a relief map, which pictured to him hillside and hamlet, stream and farm house, highway, bridge, battery, and entrenchment.

We worked our way forward, the soldiers on the front seat pressing the slower vehicles to the side. Presently the traffic began to melt along the light railways and narrower roads which lead to the actual line. The main highway was clearing. The driver hurried the car and hurried it still more.

We could hear the voice of the battle softly calling, still far off.

We raced past the nets of grass and leaves—camouflage—which as the road neared the front screened traffic from the enemy airplanes; turned up a rough road, over a steep hill, dropped down, and came to a stop under some bombed and broken buildings.

The air roared.

There were waves upon waves of sound as thousands of noises overlapped one another, shaken together, rolling apart, as far as the ears could hear, even farther—as far as the senses could imagine hearing, while overhead the many airplanes looked like a flock of birds and through the reverberations of the guns, their engines sometimes hummed like distant sawmills. There were no ear-splitting shocks, such as you have seen described. There are none save when you are near a battery or perhaps when a shell bursts too near, but the air was filled, saturated by the sound of guns, now and then punctured by the popping of the shrapnel overhead.

Before us was the Chemin des Dames, "the road of the ladies," the blood-drenched "road of the ladies," along which for months men fought and waited, in hate, to fight again. Picture a long, low flat-crested ridge, its sides covered with forests and pierced by caverns—quarries really, from which stone had been taken for the building of Paris. Here and there the ridge widens into a larger mass, from which in turn run out spurs. Such a place was it that the French planned to take. Along the center of the flat top of the ridge runs the "road of the ladies," flanked on either side by wasted fields, once fertile with the minute care of the French husbandman. Across that road the advance posts of the armies faced each other. Beyond the ridge is a valley cut by a little stream and then another ridge upon which was placed a great part of the German artillery. Southwest of the Chemin des Dames there was also a valley and stream and another ridge, on which the French had found emplacements for so many of the guns as were not thrust forward on the spurs of the larger mass which it was purposed to attack.

We had stopped in front of a hut, partly dug in the ground, partly built of sand bags and roofed with railroad iron and still more bags of sand. A calm little man in the uniform of the general of a colonial division came forward to greet us. "Permit me," he said, as we shook hands, "to introduce to you our 'wrecking contractor.'" I looked at the "contractor" with some wonder, which doubtless expressed itself on my face, for the general of the division continued, "It is his function as chief of the artillery to wreck the batteries and defenses of the enemy so that our infantry as it goes forward may not be cut up." Then I sought to catechize the chief of artillery, but our host interrupted to lead us to the sand bag and dug-out hut, which was staff headquarters and mess hall for the division. The windows shook in the shocked air. In spite of us Americans, it was impossible to confine the conversation to the subject of the attack outside. The officers wished to question us as much as we did to question them. We talked of public opinion in France, England, Italy, and America, even of literature, although we were interrupted by officers coming to report news of the action. All the while the air shivered in the torture of the bombardment.

They are very calm and cool on the battle line, those French officers. I remember when I had persuaded the commander of the citadel of Verdun to let us go to the outermost defenses, we strolled along the crest of Souville, looking down over the dip of the valley at the German batteries on the rolling ground beyond. I remarked to a French officer standing near, that considering the daily communiques of "more or less artillery activity," it was very quiet. Just then a bomb burst on the left. We did not purpose to indicate to our French companion that we were disturbed, so I waved my stick toward the enemy and asked where was the battery which sent that shell. Boom, went another just below us. "My friend," said the French officer, as he took his cigar from his mouth, "that is the way those devils always begin; high first, low next, bang through the middle the third time. Let us stroll along." [Laughter.]

But to return to the Chemin des Dames, we walked along the front of the dugout and descended into a hole in the ground, which was the office of the wrecking contractor. It was not unlike the office of an American contractor for a big job. There were plain pine shelves, upon which were stacked little reports of munitions expended and damage done, for all the world like the reports of the number of square yards of earth excavated. There were neatly classified piles of little photographs taken by the airplane observers, showing the work of the French shells upon the German defenses and batteries. Certain officers became expert to read them, just as some physicians are cunning to diagnose disease from radiographs. There were occasional supplemental reports from rarely returning airplanes, while more came by wireless from the planes equipped with Marconi instruments, advising the artillery to sprinkle a little more to the left or lower on the right. There was one report that some German battalions had been definitely located hiding in one of the quarried caverns, on which the roof was too thick to be broken in by shelling, but not too thick to crack. Orders were issued to open fire upon it with the largest shells, filled with the heavy asphyxiating gas, invented by the Germans themselves, so that through the cracks which they might make the gases could filter down and asphyxiate the men within.

When all this had been explained we moved down toward the front, first past the dugouts, where were lodged the infantry waiting for the attack to be made in the mist at dawn. There were guns behind, before, on either side. The screaming of our own shells overhead, to our untutored ears, could not be distinguished from the "arrivals," as the French dub the enemy shots. Then up past the final observation post and down to the last light batteries, just back of the trenches. Here we closed our ears to the steady pounding of the guns that did the work—that is it, the guns that did the work. They blasted the way for the infantry; they destroyed the enemy batteries, overwhelmed, stunned, slaughtered the enemy infantry, so that on the October morning when the French advanced in the measured pace of modern charges, they took with almost methodical exactness that which was planned last July for them to take, and they took it with astonishingly little loss. Have I made myself clear? It is all so clear to me that I am fearful lest I omit something which may make it intelligible to others.

Great guns are to this war what the steam shovel was to the Panama Canal. When the French company, under De Lesseps, sought to pierce the Isthmus with shovels and picks and petty machinery men died by thousands on the tropic hillsides, which they had but scratched. So fell hundreds of thousands at Mons, on the Marne, and at Verdun, who with their own bodies stopped the shells and stayed the charges which ought to have been stayed and stopped by the counterbombardment of their own batteries. Time is the essence of victory and cannon are the weapons with which it must be won. We, we Americans, must make cannon enough, in time, to win.

I do not underestimate the other agencies necessary to victory. Men we must send slowly at first, because we can send them only slowly, to join our gallant little Army across the seas. Transport there must be and aircraft—"the cavalry of the air," as Lloyd-George once called them in Celtic poesy. Guns, transports, destroyers, aircraft—25,000 guns to be made by the forges of America to win the war. That is not a figure which I summon from my inner consciousness. It is the best military opinion in Europe. The general upon whose shoulders rests the heaviest burden said to me: "We are grateful for your little army. The echo of its footfalls on our shores carried hope to every hearth in France; it told us that you had not forgotten that the blood of the soldiers of Rochambeau and Lafayette mingled with those of your forebears in the fight for American liberty; but while we await the gathering of your forces send ammunition and guns to us, that we may have the weapons to win victories and to defend ourselves, so that we may still be here in force to fight by your side on the appointed day to win victory and peace."

We know that war is an industry of destruction, but though the industry almost has hidden the romance and heroism of war, heroes there are in greater numbers than ever before.

An old friend of my mother's, a splendid American, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, sent for me in London to ask of our boys. She had come from the bedside of a young British officer, who never would walk again nor would ever again be able to take a friend by the hand. He was almost merry in his misery; glad, for although he had been crippled for life by the bomb upon which he had thrown himself, yet when it broke not one of his men had been harmed. [Applause.]

Gen. Pershing told me of a French lady, a nurse, torn by a shell. As he stood by her bed while the commander in chief of the French Army pinned upon her breast the Croix de Guerre—the soldiers' war cross, with palms—she whispered to him, "Gen. Pershing, I am glad that I have been struck, so that you may tell your countrymen that the daughters as well as the sons of France are ready to suffer and, if need be, to die—die for her and liberty." [Applause.]

I spent a day in the Hindenburg trench with a splendid Irish division. As I sat at division headquarters with the gallant Irishman who commands them, we turned the pages of the long roll of honor, counting the names of those who had done gallant deeds. There was one, that of a simple private who was lying wounded in a shell crater when he espied over the lip of a ridge, in a near distance, a German machine gunner turning his deadly fire to and fro over the ranks of the Fusileers as they sought shelter in the shell holes on that muddy slope. Up he jumped, dashed, limping, over the ridge, and brained the machine gunner with the butt of his rifle. He shouldered the machine gun and carried it back to the crater. Then, as he caught his breath, "Begorrah," he panted, "I left me gun where the Huns can get it. The old man will be giving me hell for that." And out of the crater and over the ridge he dashed again. There he came upon two of the enemy quarreling over his rifle. He flew at them with fists and feet in such fury that both surrendered. He made them carry their own guns and his as well, and back to the crater he marched them and there held them until dusk, when he took them to the rear for surrender. [Applause.] He got not hell, but the Victoria cross for that afternoon's work. [Applause.]

Oh, there are no comparisons in gallantry along that line. Among the French there are none more brave than the others, Gascon or Norman, Breton or Savoyard. In the British armies, English or Canadian, Irish or Australian, Welsh or Scotch, none are braver or better troops than the other, where all are sublime. We shall be proud of our young men. They will reflect glory on the Union. They will be a credit to the men whose arms founded the Republic and those who fought in the sixties. In generous rivalry, where all are bravest, they purpose only to be bravest, too. [Applause.]

The spirit of the armies is indomitable. The French, in spite of their terrible losses, are grimly brave, believing that by our side liberty can not lose, ready to give themselves in the last sacrifice for the future security of the world. They are brave. They are tired. They clearly know that promises are to be measured by performance. Let us not fail to do all that must be done, for their confidence in us must remain unshaken if they are to endure terrible to their enemies unto the very end.

How can I speak of the still-growing power of Britain, of the high, rollicking courage of her armies, better than to say that when I went among our men and found with them British noncommissioned officers, teachers of the deadly bayonet, professors of cold steel, each told me that the world owned no better fighting men than their brother in arms? [Applause.] Those lithe American boys will prove the peers of veteran armies. They have but two anxieties: First, lest they do not get at the enemy soon enough; second, lest the great body of the people at home lack something of the unity, the iron energy, and terrible resolve which moves the American soldiers at the front. "Tell them," they said, "tell the folks at home that if they will stand by us we'll can the Kaiser."

Sir, it is not possible within the compass of the time which the House so generously has accorded me to measure the task before us. Even the most exhaustive analysis of the economic condition of Germany leaves ground for conjecture. Let me say only that as Germany plainly has been crippled for the economic contest which must follow the war, so no less plainly has she suffered awful losses of man power. During the summer German soldiers in increasing numbers deserted, complaining that during bombardments their officers left them in the front line to seek shelter in the dugouts connected with the second. We know from prisoners captured that in the summer of 1917 there were incorporated in the armies the military classes of 1918—that is to say, lads 17 years of age—while there were many so-called volunteers of the classes of 1919, mere striplings of 16, whose tears and stifled sobs wrenched the hearts of the poilus and the Tommies who captured them. But I would not have you believe that there are not splendid German divisions, splendid in the efficiency imposed by the iron Prussian discipline. They were outgunned and they were outmanned still more, but the reenforcements brought from the eastern front will redress the balance. To the unity of purpose which actuates all the belligerents the Central Empires add a unity of command through which the Imperial German staff directs the movements of the Turks and the Bulgarians as well as of the Hapsburg and Hohenzollern forces. We are fighting the German armies; we are also fighting the German economic machine and the German administrative system. We who have tolerated inefficiency, because in a new country we could afford to do so, must now reckon that administrative energy and genius are as essential to victory as strategic skill. As the allies have marshaled armies, so they have been compelled to organize industrially and politically to combat German militarism.

As Germany may be our apprentice in democracy, so must we be her pupil in administrative energy. Even in western Europe the hand of government is now omnipresent. It measures the food and fuel of the people, allots raw products to the manufacturer, lends public credit to private enterprise, writes the terms of settlement between employee and employer. Government has created new offices in Europe, as it has restricted the activities of the old, in order that they may bear the heavier burdens imposed by the war. In France and England the manufacture of guns and munitions has been taken out of the war department, as it will be here if we are to profit by the lessons of the war. [Applause.] The task of organizing armies and of forging the instruments of destruction was too great even for the great Kitchener, so Lloyd-George, the ablest of the servants of all the enemies of Germany, was put to organizing the making of cannon and shell and shrapnel.

Government is planning not only for the war but for the economic reconstruction which must follow the war. Italy intends to double her developed water power as a state monopoly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, how much time would the gentleman like in which to finish what he has to say?

Mr. McCORMICK. I could certainly do it in 20 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 20 minutes' extra time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for 20 minutes more.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I amend that request by asking that the gentleman be allowed to go on until he concludes his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio amends that request by asking that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to proceed until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMICK. Committees of French business men, their credit underwritten by the Government, are planning the rehabilitation of her industries.

French scholars and public men have united to devise legislation to stabilize the Government and to increase the birth rate. John Bull, the old merchant and mariner, has made the most far-reaching plans of all. He knows that the world has changed, never again to be what it was before the war. Beside the other new ministers, he has appointed a minister of reconstruction, aided by committees, expert in manufactures and raw products, in problems social and problems industrial. John Bull plans also for the agricultural rehabilitation of his little island no less than he plans for the growth of his trade from the Bight of Guinea to the Gulf of Carpentaria. But most striking of all, he has already matured plans to build, at public cost, as the ink dries on the treaty of peace, 300,000 workingmen's homes. The slums, which disgraced English cities before the war, are gone, never to return. [Applause.] English workers, once chiefly interested to get a day off, are now eager to seize the new chances to get on in the world. Once underpaid, they now earn high wages. Girls in the shell shops are paid ten times the pittance they earned before the war.

It has been said that this is a war not of armies but of nations, yet until the eyes see and the ears hear it is not possible to know the measure in which the people have given themselves, body and spirit, to the conflict. The men from 18 to 40 years of age, if they be sound in body, have gone to the war. Boys have been called forward and old men called back to fill the places which the soldiers have left. Girls and young women have taken up the tools which the men have laid down. You see them everywhere, those high-hearted girls; in the stables and the shops, as conductors of omnibuses, running elevators, at work on railway trains, as messengers, as porters, as drivers of motor trucks. In France and England 2,000,000 of them are engaged in work for the war, while in England alone this year 200,000 women and girls, volunteers, went out from the cities upon the farms to garner the harvest. Crofters' lassies, daughters of old houses, girls from shops and from sheltered homes, like their brothers in the trenches, are knit together in the new democracy of toil. If in Europe they have suffered, so also have they been ennobled by self-sacrifice. Sir, there is no one of us in this House who, as his foot touched the soil of wounded France, but drew new strength from the well springs of her courage. Nor is there one of us who saw in England the fusion of true idealism and hard intelligence but felt that never in her greatest hour was England greater than she is to-day.

Yonder the national spirit has been shot through with a new fire. In England, Italy, France they began, as we have begun, with a party truce and a party administration of the war, but they have got beyond that and unite in the administration men of every great party unless they refuse to share in the responsibility of government. Whatever his legal powers may be Lloyd-George, deriving his authority from the people, directly responsible to their House of Commons, is invested with the moral authority of a dictator. But he sits daily in conference with his war cabinet of five—Smuts, the Boer general; Barnes, the labor leader; Curzon, the old Indian Viceroy; Carson, the Ulsterman; Milner, the Tory administrator. The old political elements are almost equally represented.

One of the greatest men in Europe, whose name I wish I might give this House, said:

> You Americans will have to include in the administration of the war the greatest talent in America. You will have to call to Washington your greatest leaders, regardless of past political differences and past personal animosities.

Across the seas they were divided before the war by political differences more venomous than any which we have known since the civil conflict in the sixties, but the fires of a new patriotism, kindled by the awful struggle, have fused old hatreds into a common labor and fast cooperation. [Applause.] Men embittered by years of personal and political strife have put aside all bitterness to sit at one council table, there to apportion among them without jealousy the tasks which must be done.

In democracies governments reflect the sober sense, the energy, and the courage of the people who choose them. So it was in Europe. The voice of the people of Italy, France, England, in louder tones and ever more imperative, demanded that the genius and leadership of the land be summoned to share in the government at Rome, Paris, London, there to muster the forces of the nation to the conflict. This must we do in America in order to mobilize and to direct the industrial and military forces of the greatest of all democracies. Our decisions, our promised successes, must not be stillborn, like so many of those of our friends across the sea. Idealism, democracy, great plans, will go for nothing unless they be supported by force and action. Let each of us contribute of his energy and let each, according to his conscience, speak out his measured opinion to the end that his Government may act and greatly do before it is too late. [Prolonged applause.]

CAMP CODY, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], under the special order of the House, is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, early last fall I received a letter from a young soldier constituent of mine, stationed at Camp Cody, Deming, N. Mex., which closed with this paragraph: "This camp is a hell hole, and if you can procure our transfer to some other place it will be an act of God."

"Camp Cody, Deming, N. Mex." The words floated through my mind like a song wafted on the gentle breezes of fall, and to refer to such a place as a hell hole seemed to my poor untutored mind as bordering upon the sacrilegious. I had pictured Deming as being situated in the heart of a land abounding in milk and honey, where want and privation were unknown.

Naturally, I determined to visit Camp Cody upon the first opportunity, and, after the close of the second liberty loan campaign in my district, set out for Deming. En route I visited at Camp Dodge, Iowa, for two days, where I found everything in shipshape order and the boys in the best of spirits. Before taking up the rather disagreeable subject of Deming I crave your indulgence for a moment while I dwell upon the very pleasant one of Dodge. The location is an ideal one. The boys are well housed; the site is well drained, and almost perfect health is the rule. The many boys with whom I talked were unanimous in their praise of Camp Dodge, and their well-nourished and contented looks verified all they said to me. [Applause.]

How different was the situation at Camp Cody. It is situated in the heart of a vast desert waste where one only finds dust, yuccas, cactus, sagebrush, rattlesnakes, jack rabbits, and then some more dust. Of all the God-forsaken spots in the Universe it easily holds first place. A native proudly informed me that the section adjacent to Deming has been proven by geologists to be the oldest known portion of the earth. I can easily believe that, for it has a moth-eaten and hackneyed appearance that mere words can not describe, and when I contrast it with my own State of Minnesota, I can but conclude that the glorious North Star State was one of the last places created. [Laughter.]

My impression of the town of Deming was not a favorable one. It has all the earmarks of mushroom growth. The hotel accommodations are decidedly meager. At two hotels I failed to find accommodations, while the landlord at the third place where I called offered to fix me up with a cot in a hall upstairs at an outrageous price. I declined his generosity and called up an officer friend of mine at the camp who invited me to come out and take pot luck with him, which I did.

If the village of Deming looked God forsaken, Camp Cody beggars description. It is situated in the middle of nothing, surrounded by a desert of alkali dust, ankle deep. Were I in fear of the hereafter, I would first go to Camp Cody for a preparatory course. [Laughter.] It is an annex of hades of which his Satanic Majesty is evidently ashamed, and why the War Department should have seen fit to select such a place in which to train 26,000 red-blooded young Americans I can not understand. Had I the gift of a Dante I might do justice to the subject, but its true portrayal is beyond my poor power.

Picture to yourself a vast stretch of alkali dust with a chain of mountains on either side; barren of vegetation, save for a sprinkling of cactus and yuccas; no sign of life, save the thousands of boys drilling in clouds of dust. Ye Gods! What a scene! Gov. Harding, of Iowa, upon his return from a four-days' stay there, gave out an interview wherein he likened it to hades.

In the three days I spent there my throat became so sore from breathing the alkali dust that I could not speak except with pain. Hundreds of the boys are having trouble with their eyes as a result of the dust. They drill in it and sleep in it. Is it any wonder that there is so much sickness at Camp Cody? If grit were the all-necessary requisite to military success Camp Cody has it aplenty.

The "Broomstick Brigade" was also very much in evidence at Cody. I saw several regiments but partially accoutered, and while it has not been necessary for the boys to wear each others' shoes, as has been the case at Camp Custer, according to testimony brought out at the Senate committee hearings, yet they use each other's guns. Many of the boys were without heavy underwear and mittens; they live in tents, and the cold nights now prevailing in the high altitude of Deming imposes an unnecessary hardship that could and should have been avoided.

The officers and men at Camp Cody are among the best in the country, but all are laboring under extremely difficult conditions, and were it not for the fact that all are seasoned troops who served on the border last year the task of getting them ready would be well-nigh hopeless.

The men with whom I talked could not understand why they had not been sent to Brownsville, or San Benito, Tex., where they were during the Mexican trouble, and which are situated within the boundaries of God's country. All were unanimous in declaring those ideal locations, but not one of them had a good word to say for Cody as a site. I defy any living man to advance a good and valid reason for locating a camp at Deming. It is true they have a plentiful supply of pure, cold water, but there are thousands of other places in this country where the same holds good, that are far better adapted for the training of soldiers.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will.

Mr. LITTLE. Does not the gentleman think that those who pull through would make dandy good soldiers?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes. They will be impervious to everything if they can stand Camp Cody.

Now a word about the business men of Deming. Be it understood that there is little or no agriculture in that section of the country. Heretofore their only crop has been consumptives, and when the American troops began flowing in a vista of coming wealth dazzled the eyes of the Deming merchants and presaged a crop such as they had never dreamed of, even in their most delusive moments. They fairly licked their chops in anticipation, and no time was lost in taking the wares off the shelves and marking them up, in some cases 100 per cent, and Heaven knows they were high enough before. [Laughter.]

It finally became so bad that it was necessary for the camp authorities to stock the regimental canteens with almost all necessary merchandise. One canteen that I visited carries a $5,000 stock. When the Deming merchants saw that the boys would not fall for their coarse tactics they marked the prices down to somewhere within reason. But not so with house rentals. I believe that I have already stated that the soldiers promised to be the best crop they had ever had in Deming—in fact the only crop, save for the few consumptives who go there to die. Well, many officers and a few privates brought their families with them to Deming. Those who did were robbed in a shameless manner.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. I will ask the gentleman if it is not practically a fact where all these cantonments are established? Is it not the same thing in Des Moines and the same thing in Illinois?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will say that as to Des Moines a committee has been appointed to investigate, and they invite the soldiers to report the case of any merchant who has been overcharging. I was unable to find any place where the soldiers were overcharged at Camp Dodge.

Mr. AYRES. I will say to the gentleman that I had a report from one of the captains at Des Moines, who made that complaint not more than 6 or 10 days ago.

Mr. KNUTSON. I talked with more than 100 of the men, and I did not hear of any complaint.

Mr. AYRES. Not that I am upholding them at all.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Are not the conditions in the District here equally bad as to overcharges of rents and the necessaries of life? Of course, if the gentleman has his own home here he would not perhaps be aware of it.

Mr. KNUTSON. I will show you conditions existing there that can not be duplicated anywhere in the country, if I am allowed to proceed.

Two-room unplastered shacks, about the size of a decent chicken house, bring $35 per month, while five and six room palaces, not modern, bring as high as $150 per month. I doubt if you can duplicate that anywhere else in all the world.

Mr. AYRES. Can you not duplicate that in Washington?

Mr. KNUTSON. I hardly think so. Rather than submit to the real estate highbinders who make Deming their habitat, many have built their own homes, and while they are all modest in the extreme, yet they enable their owners to escape the claws of the human vultures who would prey upon those who are about to go forth to fight, yea, mayhap, lay down their lives for their country. Any remonstrance over high prices always elicits this reply: "Well, it cost us $15,000 to get the camp here, and we've got to make it back in some way."

In that section of New Mexico they have a stream named the Mimbres River. Mimbres means "lost" in Spanish. The stream meanders down the Mimbres Valley for miles and miles, deploying out on the plains east of Deming, where it becomes smaller and smaller, finally disappearing into the ground altogether. Nature is wise, indeed. As the cactus wears a coat of thorns to protect itself against roaming beasts, so the Mimbres River seeks the protection of Mother Earth before reaching Deming, well knowing that it could never get by that den without paying a heavy toll. [Applause.]

The Germans levy tribute upon their enemies; Demingites levy toll on their friends. Which is worse?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Did not Deming have a camp for the Regular Army in 1916, before this cantonment was located there, and was there not a considerable amount of buildings there?

Mr. KNUTSON. Cantonment buildings?

Mr. HARDY. A considerable amount of buildings and a division of the Regular Army?

Mr. KNUTSON. I think the gentleman will find that everything that is there now was put up this past year.

Mr. HARDY. I think there was a camp there in 1916.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. How many soldiers have they stationed there?

Mr. KNUTSON. Twenty-six thousand.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will yield to the gentleman for a brief question.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman speaks about its having cost the merchants of that town $15,000 to get the camp. To whom did they pay that money?

Mr. KNUTSON. They did not tell me that. They told it to soldiers and officers.

Gentlemen, I believe that Cody should be changed to a more suitable location; I believe that a committee of Congress should be named to make a thorough investigation of why a cantonment was located there; that we should find out why it was necessary to spend $15,000 to get the camp located at Deming. [Applause.] Situated as it is, Camp Cody will take the heart out of the best of our boys, and the Congress of the United States owes it to itself, to the American people, and the boys stationed there to find out why that particular spot was chosen.

Only those who are callous to the needless suffering of our soldier boys will object to the bringing of these facts to light. The American people are entitled to know the truth, and he who tells it renders a most valuable service to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], who will follow me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no time left to yield. His time is out.

Mr. WALTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for 15 minutes in which to address the House at the conclusion of the addresses already scheduled.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent for 15 minutes in which to address the House at the conclusion of the address of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. ROBBINS. On what subject?

The SPEAKER. On this same subject that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] was speaking on. I take it for granted that is it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is that the subject?

Mr. WALTON. Yes; at the conclusion of the others.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is recognized for five minutes.

EX-CONGRESSMAN LAWRENCE.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, Members who served in this body previous to the Sixty-third Congress will readily recall the Member from the first Massachusetts district. Should any of the older men be asked who made friends the most readily, and the most of them, who always had a cordial greeting, a hearty handclasp, and a pleasant word for everyone, I believe the name that would be most likely to come to mind would be of this very Member.

The disposition which endeared him to his friends at home was the same as that which made him so popular in the Halls of Congress. The smile, the handclasp, the hearty laugh, were all the indications of his natural personality. I well recall during my early membership in the Sixty-third Congress how frequently Members on both sides of the House inquired most feelingly for him. It was very easy for me, a new Member, to realize what a loss the House itself felt in his retirement, both from his merit as a Member and from his personal association with his colleagues. His jovial disposition could not better be illustrated than by the remark he made to me when I asked him, after I had been elected as his successor, why he was retiring from Congress. His reply was:

I want the people to say, "Why did you?" instead of "Why don't you?"

George Pelton Lawrence was a native son of Berkshire County, Mass., where he always resided. He was a graduate of one of its academies, of Amherst College, in the class of 1880, was later admitted to the bar, and for nearly 10 years was judge of the district court. He was a member of the Massachusetts Senate from 1895 to 1897, and during the sessions of 1896 and 1897 he was the president of that body. He was first elected to this House in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and was continuously reelected until he voluntarily retired at the close of the Sixty-second Congress. He served here for many years upon the important Committee on Rivers and Harbors, having the position of ranking Republican member at the time of his retirement. He was also selected for the difficult task of aiding in the reconstruction of the rules in the Sixty-first Congress.

I should like to refer briefly to his closing remarks in Congress, which were delivered during debate on the rivers and harbors bill on March 2, 1913. His expressions on that occasion are typical of the man, and I here quote the following from the RECORD of that date:

Mr. Speaker, since I made the announcement a year ago that I would not be a candidate for reelection my colleagues upon both sides of the aisle have said so many gracious and generous things, in public and private, about me that I wish to express my very deepest appreciation. The fact that I have not merited all that has been said has not interfered in the slightest degree with my enjoyment of it.

I will confess that I am shameless to that degree. I have been a Member of the House for 15 years. I think the man must be hopeless who is not broadened and rendered more patriotic by such service. If there was about me when I came here any suggestion of sectionalism, and I presume there might have been, every vestige of it has been eliminated. [Applause.] And as I have sat here in this Congress, under one of the best and fairest Speakers that this House has ever had, and as I have worked with my colleagues upon the other side of the aisle, I must confess that it has been pretty difficult to keep myself up to the point of believing that he and they were a menace to the Republic. [Applause.]

I shall not speak in detail of my service here during 15 interesting and eventful years. Perhaps some time I shall write a book about it. That is everybody's privilege. All I wish now to say is that I shall leave the House on the 4th of March with, as you all must know, the greatest affection and good will for my colleagues on both sides of the aisle and with entire respect for their patriotic purpose. [Applause.]

His service was always of that sincere and earnest character that marked his every action through life. To this no reference need be made among his former colleagues, and it is therefore of his life at home I ask the privilege of saying a few words. Mr. Lawrence was probably personally better known to more men in western Massachusetts than any other citizen of that section. His cordial laugh is historical and proverbial. His middle name was dropped almost entirely, and when it appeared it was invariably printed in a nickname—George "Popular" Lawrence. He never failed to bring a smile to the faces of any friends among whom he was mingling or to any gathering where he made a speech. He was, however, a man of strong convictions, and mingled with his jocular ways were invariably seriousness and good judgment.

In private life he was regarded as one of the substantial citizens of our State; in public life his record here was such a brilliant one that he was frequently considered as a probable gubernatorial candidate in Massachusetts. I can not refrain from mentioning one incident indicative of his loyalty. An intimate friend met with business reverses, which brought on a nervous breakdown. Both he and Judge Lawrence were fond of tramping over our beautiful hills. For weeks he devoted himself exclusively to restoring his friend to health by taking him on long tramps and preventing his further decline.

It is sometimes said that a strong character must make enemies, but this was not true of Mr. Lawrence. I have associated for years with people among whom he lived and never heard a word of criticism of him as a man, as a statesman, or a public official. A person would be a misanthrope indeed who could find any reason to dislike George Lawrence.

After leaving Congress he was selected by the then governor, although a member of the opposition party, for one of the responsible positions in our State. This position, however, he was able to retain only for a short time. Last summer he was designated as chairman of the local exemption board in the city of North Adams. The work of that board was a severe strain upon him in that he felt the conscientious duty of designating the young men who were to enter the military service of our country from his own city. It was this service that permanently undermined his health. No man could have gone about this task with more feeling of responsibility and conscientious desire to perform his duty than did Mr. Lawrence. He gave his life in serving his country. Positions on the exemption boards are ones of patriotism, and as Mr. Lawrence lost his health and strength in that service he can be classed as one of those who have given their lives gladly in their country's cause and the patriotic call of duty. I last saw him as the first troops went to the cantonment, and, together with all his friends present, noticed that he was broken in health and was in need of a change of scene. He died in New York City on November 21 last. George Pelton Lawrence has forever left the earthly scenes which he so greatly enjoyed and where he was so much beloved. His life was a useful and illustrious one.

Verses might be quoted which would be truthful of his life and character. I prefer, however, in these brief remarks to designate him with these few words: A true friend, a brilliant statesman, a manly man. [Applause.]

CAMP CODY, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. WALTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to apologize to the gentlemen of the House for taking their time at this particular moment, but I would not be doing my duty toward myself or toward the people whom I represent if I did not at least make some reply to the unjust charges, the unfounded accusations, the unwarranted criticisms just made upon a community in my State—one of the most progressive cities in New Mexico—by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON]. I am compelled most earnestly to take issue with the gentleman as to the accuracy of the information upon which his remarks are based and upon the conclusion which he has reached as a result of that information. The gentleman's visit to Deming and Camp Cody—Camp Cody being located very close to the city of Deming—must necessarily have been a very brief one. The impressions which he gained were unquestionably the result of hasty information, obtained from those who had recently left their comfortable homes and taken up the inevitable rigors of camp life and who had not yet accustomed themselves to their new surroundings. I do not deem that to be a reflection upon the patriotism and loyalty of those boys. To use a slang expression, to "kick," to register complaints, is only human nature, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] has apparently paid attention only to the registered "kicks" and has not looked for the benefits and advantages manifestly apparent from the location of that camp.

Camp Cody was selected for a cantonment only after an exhaustive and careful investigation by the officials of the War Department. Not only did the natural advantages of the place commend it to favorable consideration, but past experience has demonstrated its availability and its advantages as a site for a cantonment or a military camp. With an abundant supply of pure water—99.99 per cent pure, by Government analysis—with a climate that is mild, both in summer and in winter, with excellent railroad facilities, Deming possesses the additional advantage of being located within a short distance of the Mexican border, where past experience has demonstrated that troops in large numbers are liable to be needed at almost any moment. There was, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] indicated in his inquiry, a National Guard cantonment at Deming in the spring and summer of 1916, and the experience of that time demonstrated to the War Department that the site was an admirable one, both from a strategic and a practical standpoint. The camp has received high praise from such real red-blooded American soldiers as Maj. Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, Chief of Staff; Maj. Gen. H. A. Green; and Maj. Gen. E. F. Glenn, who was in command there in 1916.

Digressing for a moment, and while I think about it, to answer the statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota that some one told some person, and some person told somebody else, and so on and so forth, that $15,000 had been expended to secure the location of the camp at Deming, I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I was present in Washington when the committee came from Deming to present the availability of that section; that the committee consisted of the president of the chamber of commerce and the mayor of the village of Deming; that they were here absolutely at their own expense; that they did not wine; that they did not give dinners; and all that they did was to go to the War Department—because I accompanied them and was present and know whereof I speak—and present a written statement of the advantages of the camp and offer the donation of the land necessary for the camp.

I know that of my own knowledge. The particular advantage of the location of Camp Cody is the mild and equitable climate, permitting of outdoor work every day of the year. The average yearly temperature in that section—and I live within 48 miles of Deming; have lived there 27 years and certainly know something about conditions; also having lived in Deming—is about 45 degrees. The latest data which I have noticed was for the year 1915, when the average temperature was 58 degrees. The number of sunshiny days was 323. The highest average monthly temperature was 77 and the lowest 44. The soldier boys there can work and train in the open and with absolute comfort all the year round.

With reference to dust, Mr. Speaker, which seems to have made such a very vivid impression on the distinguished gentleman, I desire to say that in all sections of the Southwest there are at infrequent intervals dust storms; and I presume that the visit of the gentleman occurred on one of these very rare occasions. These storms are really healthful in effect, purifying, as they do, the atmosphere. A large body of men moving around as they do in Camp Cody naturally creates dust, but it is a pleasure to inform the gentleman that this condition has been rectified by the liberal sprinkling of water and oil and no longer exists, if it ever did exist as he describes it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I called at the office of the Surgeon General the other day in regard to conditions in Camp Cody. I have heard that some criticism was about to be made relative to the camp and I asked a formal expression of that office especially as to health conditions there, and I received this letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, December 14, 1917.

Hon. W. B. WALTON,
Room 172, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WALTON: In compliance with your request of this morning, I am directed by the Surgeon General to make the following statement in regard to health conditions in the Thirty-fourth Division, National Guard, at present stationed at Camp Cody, N. Mex.:

This camp is excellently located. Its general sanitary condition and sanitary administration has been reported as excellent by all inspectors, including an inspector from this office. The climate is a fine one.

It is believed that health conditions would have remained excellent at this camp had it not been for the outbreak of measles, which started soon after drafted men had been received. The outbreak of measles assumed considerable proportions by the middle of November, since which time the number of new cases reported each week has been increasing, but not to the same extent as in a number of other camps of the National Guard made up of troops from the more sparsely settled States.

Reports from Camp Cody indicate that the type of measles cases is mild. The outbreak has been attended by a few cases of pneumonia as a complication, and, as with pneumonia, there is always a certain proportion of deaths.

As regards pneumonia at Camp Cody, the death rate has been remarkably low. The proportion of cases of pneumonia following measles has also been much lower than in the other camps.

Conditions would appear to indicate that the measles outbreak has about reached its height at this camp. Additional cases of pneumonia are to be expected, but as the measles subside these will no doubt diminish in number. Generally conditions at Camp Cody may be said to be better than at five or six other National Guard camps and not so good as at five or six others. These latter camps are composed of troops from the more densely populated Northern States, among whom the proportion of men who have not had measles is small. All reports indicate that the extent to which the National Guard camps suffer from measles depends very largely upon the number of men in the camp who have not had the disease in childhood. Western troops appear to go through the disease easier than those from the South and with fewer complications and a much lower death rate.

No unfavorable criticism has been received in this office in regard to the care of patients in the hospital at Camp Cody. The chiefs of the Medical Service have been selected with great care from among the most prominent specialists in the country. During the height of the measles outbreak the doctors, nurses, and attendants have no doubt been very hard worked, and for this reason the same personal attention which a sick man may receive in his home could not be expected in the Camp Cody hospital. Nothing has been received to indicate that there has not at all times been plenty of vacant beds and ample supplies of bedding, with medical supplies and equipment sufficient to meet all needs.

Very sincerely, yours,
F. P. REYNOLDS,
Colonel, Medical Corps.

And also an extract from telegraphic report dated Camp Cody, December 29, 1917, to the Surgeon General from the committee of special sanitary inspectors, composed of Col. P. M. Ashburn, Medical Corps; Maj. William H. Welch, and Maj. A. C. Abbott:

Conditions in this camp generally very satisfactory. All your recommendations being put into effect, but recommend expediting plumbing and sewerage. Measles situation controlled. Pneumonia not so bad as in many places, and mortality not unusually high. Meningitis not a problem. Venereal record excellent. Medical affairs in division and hospital well handled and not criticized.

The charge made by the gentleman from Minnesota that exorbitant charges were being demanded by the people of Deming for the rental of houses and for the purchase of merchandise, with all due respect to him, is absolutely not substantiated by the facts.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Did not the officials at the camp warn the boys not to trade at Deming, but to trade at the canteen?

Mr. WALTON. Every Army post of which I have knowledge has what is called a canteen, and it is customary and usual for the soldiers to trade at those canteens. Now, I am in receipt of a telegram from the Chamber of Commerce of Deming, which I think explains the situation, and shows also the high patriotism of the people of that place.

Mr. HARDY. Before the gentleman leaves that point I want to say that I was in Deming in 1916. They had a good many splendid buildings there and were still adding to them for a camp for the Regular Army. How many regiments were there I do not know.

Mr. WALTON. There were about 5,000 National Guard troops stationed there during the crisis in the Mexican affairs.

Mr. HARDY. That is about the number I thought.

Mr. WALTON. The telegram is as follows:

DEMING, N. MEX., December 10, 1917.

Hon. W. B. WALTON,
Washington, D. C.:

When camp was first started and thousands of people flocked to Deming, some to work on camp construction and others to start in business, there were some cases of high rents, for which the owners of the property were not responsible. They leased at reasonable prices, but speculators drove up the rents on business property. In one or two instances Army officers got to bidding against each other on furnished residence property and drove up rents in that way. Members of the chamber of commerce and business men of Deming have done everything possible to relieve the situation by constructing houses with modern improvements at actual loss for Army men with families at $20 and $25 per month, and the chamber of commerce is offering to furnish ground rent free to any officer or enlisted man who wishes to erect temporary residences. Over 300 residences have been erected in this way.

SECRETARY DEMING CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Now, I might say that the increase in the population of Deming, which was formerly about 4,000, has been about 10,000. I know of my own knowledge that many reputable business men of Deming have erected houses, when they had no desire to do so, simply to provide accommodations to newcomers, and they rented them at a reasonable price.

A meeting of the chamber of commerce was held a little while ago to investigate complaints of overcharges at which a committee of officers attended by invitation, and after a careful and exhaustive investigation not a single case was found where a soldier had been charged in excess of the prices that were charged the local people—not a single case of discrimination. And the secretary of that body addressed a formal letter to the officers in charge of the camp asking them to report any cases of violation in order that prompt and summary action might be taken. Certainly nothing more could be done. Deming has a reputation for fair dealing that was established long before any soldiers were sent there, and is doing everything that it possibly can to maintain that reputation.

The people of Deming are my neighbors—almost my home folks—and I do not speak from conjecture or hearsay when I undertake to voice their sentiments in these matters. I can say from my own personal knowledge that there has been no effort on the part of representative citizens to exact from the soldiers or from those brought to Deming by reason of the existence of the cantonments any higher prices than are charged to their own people. Not only that, but I assert that there has not in any camp site in the United States been a more earnest and patriotic effort on the part of the local citizenry to aid the Government in the stupendous task of fitting its soldiers for the war and to aid the soldiers in all matters that pertained to their welfare and comfort. There are no more hospitable, no more loyal, no more patriotic people in the country than are to be found in Deming and in Luna County, N. Mex.; and I keenly resent any statements that reflect on these qualities of their citizenship.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think that I can offer an explanation of the reason for the gentleman's criticism. I suspect that he fears, and his fears are well founded, that the boys from Minnesota and the other States at Camp Cody will be so enamored of the magnificent climate of New Mexico, so impressed with the great resources of the country, so enthusiastic over the wonderful opportunities awaiting there that they never will be content to return to their former homes in the bleak and dreary Northwest, but at the conclusion of the war will come back to the Sunshine State and cast their lot with us. And they will be welcome—heartily welcome.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOSTER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the gentleman only wants to extend his remarks as far as his own speech and not by incorporating other letters and telegrams.

Mr. WALTON. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This being unanimous-consent day, the Clerk will call the first bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

NATURALIZATION OF RESIDENT ALIENS.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3132) to amend section 2171 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to naturalization.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether this authorization granting the right of citizenship to those who declared their intentions prior to our entry into the war has the indorsement of the State Department? It is true that it only modifies the existing statute by substituting the date of April 6, 1917, for the earlier date when this statute was last amended.

Mr. KITCHIN. In the absence of the gentleman from California, I ask to have this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman.

There was no objection.

FOR INCREASE OF PRODUCTION IN RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4431) to provide for the common defense and general welfare by increasing the production upon public and private lands within the United States reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman modify his objection so as to allow the bill to remain on the calendar?

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the purpose? It has been on the calendar for months. It should not be taken up by unanimous consent and can be taken up on a call of committees. It is a bill containing important provisions to which there are serious objections. I do not think it will ever be considered under unanimous consent, and I do not see any necessity of encumbering the Unanimous-Consent Calendar with it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman has serious objections to it, of course there is no use in retaining it on the calendar, but the Interior Department and the Reclamation Service are very much in earnest about this bill. They speak to me every few days about it and want to know when it is coming up. There is nothing personal to me in it; it is a departmental bill, and the Reclamation Service has been very urgent to have it taken up.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a rare thing to put a bill on the Unanimous-Consent Calendar where there is a minority report.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I understand that.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a minority report on this bill, where the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has gone to the pains of preparing a very elaborate argument stating objections to the bill. This involves the expenditure of several million dollars, and the bill should not remain on the Unanimous-Consent Calendar. I therefore object.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

CITIZENS OF ALLIED COUNTRIES IN UNITED STATES MILITARY FORCES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 115, requesting the Secretary of State to open diplomatic negotiations with certain Governments with a view to obtaining their approval and sanction for action by the United States permitting the inclusion in the armed forces of the United States of such citizens of the countries of such Governments as are within the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the author of this resolution is out of the Chamber at the present time and I ask unanimous consent in deference to him to have the resolution passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the resolution be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AUXILIARY RECLAMATION PROJECT, YUMA, ARIZ.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill 3135, to amend section 4 of the act entitled "An act to provide for an auxiliary reclamation project in connection with the Yuma project, Arizona.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to obtain some information about the bill which is not given in the report. I wish to inquire what additional funds will be utilized in the construction of the project if this amendment be adopted? As I understand the present law, the funds that can be utilized for the construction work on this auxiliary project at Yuma must arise from the sale of lands exclusively. I wish to inquire, if this condition be lifted, what additional funds will be available?

Mr. HAYDEN. The law as it now stands is inconsistent with itself. The act of January 25, 1917, provides that money received from the sale of public lands and money received from the owners of private lands included within the project shall be placed in a separate fund in the Treasury, to be known as the auxiliary reclamation fund of the Yuma project. But in section 4 of the act there is a provision that the moneys in this special fund, only to the extent which they are received from the sale of public lands, may be used in the construction of the works of the auxiliary project. I am trying to correct this inconsistency so as to let all of the money which may be placed in the fund be used to pay for the irrigation works, regardless of whether received from the sale of public lands or as payments made by the owners of private lands.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was not the money from private owners of land on this project to be raised merely for the use of water rights rather than from the sale of land itself?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is true, of course; because if a man owns his land he would not have to again pay for it; but in order to obtain a water right for his land he has to pay the same construction charge as anyone else. The whole theory of the bill was that the private landowner should pay his full share, just the same as the man who bought public land.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, a private owner can avail himself of the advantages of this project if he contributes the regular price fixed by the Secretary of the Interior for the use of the water.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And now you wish to utilize whatever he contributes to this fund for that purpose before he receives any water at all?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; everyone has to advance some money before he gets any water. In other words, the plan is that the landowners shall advance their share of the money and that the public lands shall be sold and the payments thus obtained placed in this fund, the combined amount to be available before any construction work is undertaken.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much money is it contemplated to expend in the construction of this project?

Mr. HAYDEN. The dam is already built. A pumping plant is to be constructed to lift the water from the existing main canal to the level of the mesa, where it will be distributed by a canal system.

Mr. STAFFORD. What amount is estimated will be raised?

Mr. HAYDEN. The estimate of cost had not been completed, but the latest figures are about $100 an acre.

Mr. STAFFORD. What total amount will be required?

Mr. HAYDEN. If 40,000 acres could be irrigated, it would amount to $4,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much money will arise from the sale of public lands?

Mr. HAYDEN. If all of the private lands are taken into the project they will amount to about 7,000 acres out of a total of 40,000 acres. It will be possible to irrigate approximately 33,000 acres of public land and 7,000 acres of private land.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much money will be realized from the sale of these public lands?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Reclamation Service expects to raise about $100 an acre from each source. That would be $3,300,000 from the public-land and $700,000 from the private-land owners.

Mr. STAFFORD. The thought occurred to me, in reading the bill in connection with the original act, that you were trying to obtain from the private-land owner the use of money for a right that could not be charged to him until the works are in operation.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no money available with which to construct this project, because the regular reclamation fund is practically exhausted. In his report on the bill that we are now amending the Secretary of the Interior describes its objects as follows:

The bill provides a means by which it is made possible that the work of reclaiming the mesa lands of the Yuma project may be continued without further expense to the United States or draft upon the reclamation fund, a work which in the present condition of the reclamation fund must otherwise be delayed for many years.

It purposes to create an auxiliary reclamation fund to be constituted of the proceeds of the sale of the future water rights which will attach and become appurtenant to the lands when the irrigation works have been completed. No works are to be undertaken until a sufficient sum has been subscribed and paid in to insure the completion thereof. It also provides for the payment into the reclamation fund of a sufficient amount to cover the proportionate cost of the main Yuma project works.

The mesa lands of the Yuma project are generally believed to be the best citrus-fruit lands in the United States, free from the dangers of frost, and to be worth much more when irrigated than the cost of the irrigation works necessary to completely reclaim them. It is believed that experienced citrus-fruit growers will gladly pay for such lands the prices that will be fixed under this act if it becomes a law, and that the resulting benefits to the Yuma project as a whole and to the reclamation fund will wholly justify the experiment. Under its provisions the money must be paid into the Treasury before any liabilities are incurred or expenditures made for construction purposes, and none in excess of the amounts so paid in.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the auxiliary project for the mesa lands at Yuma?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Where it is necessary to pump the water up to the higher levels to irrigate it?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. That was to be a purely auxiliary project to the Yuma project?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. It was to carry itself?

Mr. HAYDEN. The auxiliary project must bear its share of the burden of the works heretofore constructed and all additional work.

Mr. BORLAND. And any additional work necessary to put in this pumping plant to raise the water to that level?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the bill result in taking any part of the funds collected for water rentals on the lower lands and applying them to the mesa lands?

Mr. HAYDEN. No. The two units are separate and distinct in every particular.

Mr. BORLAND. Are you still adhering to your original plan that the mesa land shall bear its share of the original construction and also an additional share of the other construction?

Mr. HAYDEN. Exactly so.

Mr. BORLAND. You are not departing from that at all?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no change at all. The truth of the matter is that the law we are now seeking to amend was originally prepared by the Reclamation Service, was introduced and passed the Senate, and then passed through the House. None of us at that time noted this inconsistency in the original bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Why, if that is true and you are proceeding on your original proposition, are you asking water rentals to be applied to construction when, as the gentleman from Wisconsin says, there are no water rentals on the mesa land?

Mr. HAYDEN. I was perhaps incorrect in using that term, but what I am really trying to do is to make available the money that will be received from the private-land owners for the construction of this project. One part of the law provides that they shall pay the same for water rights as the purchasers of public land, but when their money once gets into the fund it can not now be used.

Mr. BORLAND. Does that apply only to private-land owners who happen to be on the mesa?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is all.

Mr. BORLAND. And who happen to be engaged on this auxiliary project?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The main part of the auxiliary project was to be paid by the sale of public lands on the mesa, but there are certain privately owned lands to whom it is proposed to sell water rights.

Mr. HAYDEN. Because of the physical situation there, which makes it advantageous to include the private lands within the project.

Mr. BORLAND. So that the money you will get from the private-land owners of the mesa you intend to apply to construction, and you are not asking any water rentals from the original project for the mesa land?

Mr. HAYDEN. It aids the original project to the extent that the lands on the mesa help to pay for the irrigation works heretofore constructed.

Mr. BORLAND. To that extent it is an additional help to the Yuma project?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is it, exactly.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like some further information. From what source is the money derived that goes into this auxiliary reclamation fund now?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no money in the auxiliary reclamation fund now. The bill provides that the public lands located on the Yuma mesa shall be sold to create such a fund.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman says there is no money, the bill expressly limits the appropriations to the money in the fund.

Mr. HAYDEN. As a matter of fact the plans have not been carried out far enough to determine how much the charges will be. The Secretary of the Interior by the act passed in the last Congress is directed to ascertain the proportionate cost of the work heretofore constructed which should be charged to the mesa land, and then to ascertain the cost of the works to be constructed in the future—that is, the pumps, canals, etc., needed to deliver the water to the mesa land. Using these two estimated costs as the basis, he is to fix an appraised price for the public lands and offer them for sale. If he receives enough money from that source and from a like charge paid by the private landowners, he is then authorized to construct the new project. That is the sum and substance of the scheme.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, let me ask this question: A portion of the burden of the original project is to be borne by this auxiliary district?

Mr. HAYDEN. And very properly so.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, if we permit all the money of this fund to be used in the construction work of this auxiliary district, how is the main project to get its share of the burden that should be borne by the district?

Mr. HAYDEN. Because the proportionate cost of the works heretofore constructed is included in the charge which all of the lands in the auxiliary project must bear.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but if it is paid into this fund and then can be used entirely for construction within the auxiliary district, how does the Yuma project get its share?

Mr. HAYDEN. Of course, if a thing like that could happen the original Yuma project would not receive its proportionate share, but as a matter of fact the price that must be paid includes the two costs, the cost of the works heretofore constructed and the cost of the work hereafter done, so the fund will be large enough to pay both costs.

Mr. LENROOT. But does not the bill permit all money, that for the auxiliary district and that for the main project, to be used within the auxiliary district, and is not that the purpose of it?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; the object of the bill is to make available the money received from the private landowners for the same purposes as the money received from the sale of public lands.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that the bill is limited to that? All the money in the fund may be used now, if this bill passes, for this purpose, without any portion of it being used to defray its share of the burden of the original project.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have no such fear, because I am sure that the total sum of money received from the sales of the public land and the payments made by the private landowners will be sufficient to pay both costs. Otherwise there would be no advantage to the reclamation fund. If this plan is successful there will be immediately paid into the reclamation fund the proportionate part of the cost of the Laguna Dam and the other irrigation works now in existence. That is the plan, and we have no desire to depart from it.

Mr. LENROOT. What proportion of the lands within this auxiliary district is in private ownership and what portion has been public lands and sold?

Mr. HAYDEN. There are about 40,000 acres in the auxiliary project, about 33,000 acres of public lands, and approximately 7,000 acres in private ownership.

Mr. LENROOT. If there are 33,000 acres sold and the law now provides all the proceeds of that can be used within the district, although a portion of it is for the purpose of carrying the burden of the Yuma project, is not the district already getting more than its share without the use of the money from the private lands?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not know what the proportionate cost will be between the irrigation works to be constructed and the works heretofore constructed. But I do know that the Yuma mesa should be treated as one project, the private lands and the public lands, and all the funds received from them treated exactly in the same way. That is what this bill seeks to do. It was a mere oversight that we did not do so in the first place.

Mr. LENROOT. As to the law passed last January, there must have been some purpose in the use of that language.

Mr. HAYDEN. There was not. It was one of those cases where somebody, in trying to be very careful, said something they did not intend to say. That is the explanation the Reclamation Service gives for the use of this language.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman is willing to assure the House that the original project will not lose any of the share that belongs to it?

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, absolutely so. I am here representing the people now living on the Yuma project, rather than somebody who in the future may be benefited by this plan.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the House whether there is any precedent for this character of legislation, calling upon owners of private lands to utilize their rental for prospective rights in the construction of water-power plants?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not know that there is any precedent for it, but we were driven to this extremity because the reclamation fund itself was exhausted. There was no other way to obtain the money to do this work, and the owners of the private land included in the project are more than willing to advance the money to the Government and let that work be done by the Reclamation Service.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. My opinion is that the plan adopted on the auxiliary Yuma project is a very splendid plan, and the only regrettable fact of the situation is that there are not more lands that we can apply such a good plan to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, amid conditions that try men's souls and that put to the utmost test the fiber of our national life, we bless Thee for the light that shines upon our pathway and for the assurance of our own hearts that we do not hesitate to confess to the world that our desire as a Nation is only to advance the interests of mankind, to establish peace and brotherhood among men, to extend the borders of Thy kingdom in the earth, and to glorify Thy holy name. We pray Thee to further us in our undertakings in Thy name and give us the assurance that Thou art leading us on to victory. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LIEU-LAND CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 11, 1917, copies of various papers in connection with forest lieu selection No. 2904, involving lands claimed by Alma De Long and others as entrymen or contestants, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Coal Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Pike County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va., and I submit a report (No. 186) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were, on page 1, lines 5, 6, 7, and 8, to strike out "in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906"; in line 9, after the words "Tug River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation"; and, on page 2, line 2, to strike out the words "the said bridge to be constructed," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the P. M. C. Coal Co., and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Tug River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, one end of the said bridge being in Pike County, Ky., near the western portal of Hatfield Tunnel of the Norfolk & Western Railway, and the other end of the said bridge being on the opposite side of Tug River, in Mingo County, in the State of West Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 8th day of January, 1918, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which was read:

House concurrent resolution 32.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 8th day of January, 1918, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution that has just been laid before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

SUPPLY OF PRINT PAPER.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 101, the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is a very important matter, and I ask that the joint resolution may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of print paper at a fair price and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States.

Whereas by reason of a state of war now existing it is essential to the national security and defense for the successful prosecution of the war to assure a supply of print paper and its equitable distribution at a fair price in order that the Government of the United States may be assured an adequate supply of paper products and that all proper news may be generally and efficiently disseminated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered to supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States, and that all mills producing and all agencies distributing print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States shall be operated on Government account; that these products be pooled in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission for the term of the war and the emergency occasioned thereby and equitably distributed at a price based upon cost of production and distribution plus a fair profit per ton, as determined by the Federal Trade Commission: Provided, That if the compensation so determined be not satisfactory to the person, company, or corporation entitled to receive the same such person, company, or corporation shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the Federal Trade Commission and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation for such paper, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies.

SEC. 2. That the President is authorized and empowered to take all proper steps to secure the cooperation of the Government of the Dominion of Canada in the creation of a similar agency as herein provided, with like functions; and the Federal Trade Commission is authorized and empowered to act in conjunction with such Canadian agency, when appointed to the end of fully effectuating the objects of this act.

SEC. 3. That the President shall have power by proclamation to declare that imports into the United States during the present war emergency of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp shall be made only on Government account to or through the Federal Trade Commission, if and whenever he shall determine such step to be necessary in order to fully effectuate the objects of this act.

SEC. 4. That compliance with all orders and regulations of the Federal Trade Commission made in accordance with this act shall be obligatory on any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or the responsible head or heads thereof, and shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts heretofore placed with such individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry; and any individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or the responsible head or heads thereof, failing to comply with the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years or by a fine of not exceeding $50,000, or both.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have had no opportunity to get together the Committee on Printing since this joint resolution was reported. I have had interviews with the Trade Commission and some of the newspaper publishers themselves; and to the joint resolution I wish to offer the amendments which the Secretary will please read as a part of the joint resolution, modifying in a great measure the extreme powers granted in the first instance.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is a most important measure, and I ask the Senator if he will not have the amendments printed, because I doubt very much whether he intends to force the passage of the joint resolution to-day. We can then see exactly what effect they will have upon the joint resolution as reported.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would have no objection that the amendments I have placed in the hands of the Secretary be printed, with a new print of the joint resolution with those proposed amendments in it, they being a substitute for certain parts of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. That will be all right. I should like to have them read now, and then they will go into the RECORD and we can see them to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is what I was asking.

Mr. SMOOT. My suggestion was they be read and then they may be printed immediately.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have sent to the Secretary the amendments in the order in which they are to be made, and I ask him to read them, so they will appear in the RECORD just exactly as they will appear in the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. That will be all right, then, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is the request I make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendments.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, after the word "That," in line 3, strike out down to and including the word "empowered," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof "whenever during the continuance of the war and for six months thereafter the President shall deem it needful, he may direct the Federal Trade Commission." On page 2, after the word "pulp," in line 2, insert the words "and their products." On page 2, strike out the word "all," on line 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "such." On page 2, line 3, strike out the word "all" and insert in lieu thereof the word "such." On page 2, line 4, after the word "pulp," insert "and their products." On page 2, line 4, after the word "States," insert the following words "as the President shall designate." On page 2, after the comma, in line 18, insert the words "pulp and pulp products." And strike out all of section 3, page 3, and insert in lieu thereof:

That the President, during the present war emergency, shall have power, by proclamation, to declare that such imports of mechanical and chemical pulp and their products as he shall deem necessary in order to fully effectuate the objects of this act, shall be made only on account of the United States of America, to or through the Federal Trade Commission.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Whereas by reason of a state of war now existing it is essential to the national security and defense for the successful prosecution of the war to assure a supply of print paper and its equitable distribution at a fair price in order that the Government of the United States may be assured an adequate supply of paper products and that all proper news may be generally and efficiently disseminated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That whenever during the continuance of the war and for six months thereafter the President shall deem it needful, he may direct the Federal Trade Commission to supervise control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp and their products in the United States, and that such mills producing and such agencies distributing print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp and their products in the United States as the President shall designate shall be operated on Government account; that these products be pooled in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission for the term of the war and the emergency occasioned thereby and equitably distributed at a price based upon cost of production and distribution plus a fair profit per ton, as determined by the Federal Trade Commission: Provided, That if the compensation so determined be not satisfactory to the person, company, or corporation entitled to receive the same such person, company, or corporation shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the Federal Trade Commission and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation for such paper, pulp, and pulp products, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies.

SEC. 2. That the President is authorized and empowered to take all proper steps to secure the cooperation of the Government of the Dominion of Canada in the creation of a similar agency as herein provided, with like functions; and the Federal Trade Commission is authorized and empowered to act in conjunction with such Canadian agency, when appointed to the end of fully effectuating the objects of this act.

SEC. 3. That the President, during the present war emergency, shall have power by proclamation to declare that such imports of mechanical or chemical pulp and their products as he shall deem necessary in order to fully effectuate the objects of this act, shall be made only on account of the United States of America, to or through the Federal Trade Commission.

SEC. 4. That compliance with all orders and regulations of the Federal Trade Commission made in accordance with this act shall be obligatory on any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or the responsible head or heads thereof, and shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts heretofore placed with such individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry; and any individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or the responsible head or heads thereof, failing to comply with the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years or by a fine of not exceeding $50,000, or both.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, as a concurrent resolution has just been adopted providing that the two Houses shall meet in joint session in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 12.30 o'clock, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. MARTIN. That is not necessary. When the Senate returns to its Chamber the measure in charge of the Senator from Arizona will be automatically before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then I suggest that some Senator make an appropriate motion.

Mr. MARTIN. That is not necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask my friend, the Senator from Arizona, if he is not willing to let this joint resolution go over until to-morrow. I want to look into it with a good deal of care. I apprehend there will be no disposition at all to unduly hold the joint resolution back, but I should like to examine the amendments in connection with the joint resolution, and I want also to communicate with one or two people who are interested in this matter. I have had no time to do so in the last few days.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection to that. I do not wish to attempt to rush the joint resolution through without proper consideration by the Senate. The only objection I have on earth to any delay is the fear that the measure may be displaced by some more important matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. With the understanding that no effort will be made to do that——

Mr. GALLINGER. We will cooperate with the Senator to see that that is not done.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. With that understanding, I am perfectly willing that the consideration of the joint resolution shall go over until to-morrow, and with the understanding also that the joint resolution will be printed as proposed to be amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The Chair can not be a party to making arrangements as to the unfinished business. The hands of the Chair must be clean about this matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the joint resolution be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is the request that I originally made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be temporarily laid aside.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour arriving at which, in accordance with the concurrent resolution, the Senate is to proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to hear such communication as the President of the United States may be pleased to deliver, the order will now be carried out.

Thereupon the Senate, preceded by its Sergeant at Arms, and headed by the Vice President and Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

At 1 o'clock p. m. the Senate returned to its Chamber and the Vice President resumed the chair.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 765).

The address of the President of the United States, this day delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress, is as follows:

Gentlemen of the Congress, once more, as repeatedly before, the spokesmen of the Central Empires have indicated their desire to discuss the objects of the war and the possible bases of a general peace. Parleys have been in progress at Brest-Litovsk between Russian representatives and representatives of the Central Powers, to which the attention of all the belligerents has been invited for the purpose of ascertaining whether it may be possible to extend these parleys into a general conference with regard to terms of peace and settlement. The Russian representatives presented not only a perfectly definite statement of the principles upon which they would be willing to conclude peace, but also an equally definite programme of the concrete application of those principles. The representatives of the Central Powers, on their part, presented an outline of settlement which, if much less definite, seemed susceptible of liberal interpretation until their specific programme of practical terms was added. That programme proposed no concessions at all either to the sovereignty of Russia or to the preferences of the populations with whose fortunes it dealt, but meant, in a word, that the Central Empires were to keep every foot of territory their armed forces had occupied,—every province, every city, every point of vantage,—as a permanent addition to their territories and their power. It is a reasonable conjecture that the general principles of settlement which they at first suggested originated with the more liberal statesmen of Germany and Austria, the men who have begun to feel the force of their own peoples' thought and purpose, while the concrete terms of actual settlement came from the military leaders who have no thought but to keep what they have got. The negotiations have been broken off. The Russian representatives were sincere and in earnest. They cannot entertain such proposals of conquest and domination.

The whole incident is full of significance. It is also full of perplexity. With whom are the Russian representatives dealing? For whom are the representatives of the Central Empires speaking? Are they speaking for the majorities of their respective parliaments or for the minority parties, that military and imperialistic minority which has so far dominated their whole policy and controlled the affairs of Turkey and of the Balkan states which have felt obliged to become their associates in the war? The Russian representatives have insisted, very justly, very wisely, and in the true spirit of modern democracy, that the conferences they have been holding with the Teutonic and Turkish statesmen should be held within open, not closed, doors, and all the world has been audience, as was desired. To whom have we been listening, then? To those who speak the spirit and intention of the Resolutions of the German Reichstag of the ninth of July last, the spirit and intention of the liberal leaders and parties of Germany, or to those who resist and defy that spirit and intention and insist upon conquest and subjugation? Or are we listening, in fact, to both, unreconciled and in open and hopeless contradiction? These are very serious and pregnant questions. Upon the answer to them depends the peace of the world.

But, whatever the results of the parleys at Brest-Litovsk, whatever the confusions of counsel and of purpose in the utterances of the spokesmen of the Central Empires, they have again attempted to acquaint the world with their objects in the war and have again challenged their adversaries to say what their objects are and what sort of settlement they would deem just and satisfactory. There is no good reason why that challenge should not be responded to, and responded to with the utmost candor. We did not wait for it. Not once, but again and again, we have laid our whole thought and purpose before the world, not in general terms only, but each time with sufficient definition to make it clear what sort of definitive terms of settlement must necessarily spring out of them. Within the last week Mr. Lloyd George has spoken with admirable candor and in admirable spirit for the people and Government of Great Britain. There is no confusion of counsel among the adversaries of the Central Powers, no uncertainty of principle, no vagueness of detail. The only secrecy of counsel, the only lack of fearless frankness, the only failure to make definite statement of the objects of the war, lies with Germany and her Allies. The issues of life and death hang upon these definitions. No statesman who has the least conception of his responsibility ought for a moment to permit himself to continue this tragical and appalling outpouring of blood and treasure unless he is sure beyond a peradventure that the objects of the vital sacrifice are part and parcel of the very life of Society, and that the people for whom he speaks think them right and imperative as he does.

There is, moreover, a voice calling for these definitions of principle and of purpose which is, it seems to me, more thrilling and more compelling than any of the many moving voices with which the troubled air of the world is filled. It is the voice of the Russian people. They are prostrate and all but helpless, it would seem, before the grim power of Germany, which has hitherto known no relenting and no pity. Their power, apparently, is shattered. And yet their soul is not subservient. They will not yield either in principle or in action. Their conception of what is right, of what it is humane and honorable for them to accept, has been stated with a frankness, a largeness of view, a generosity of spirit, and a universal human sympathy which must challenge the admiration of every friend of mankind; and they have refused to compound their ideals or desert others that they themselves may be safe. They call to us to say what it is that we desire, in what, if in anything, our purpose and our spirit differ from theirs; and I believe that the people of the United States would wish me to respond, with utter simplicity and frankness. Whether their present leaders believe it or not, it is our heartfelt desire and hope that some way may be opened whereby we may be privileged to assist the people of Russia to attain their utmost hope of liberty and ordered peace.

It will be our wish and purpose that the processes of peace, when they are begun, shall be absolutely open and that they shall involve and permit henceforth no secret understandings of any kind. The day of conquest and aggrandizement is gone by; so is also the day of secret covenants entered into in the interest of particular governments and likely at some unlooked-for moment to upset the peace of the world. It is this happy fact, now clear to the view of every public man whose thoughts do not still linger in an age that is dead and gone, which makes it possible for every nation whose purposes are consistent with justice and the peace of the world to avow now or at any other time the objects it has in view.

We entered this war because violations of right had occurred which touched us to the quick and made the life of our own people impossible unless they were corrected and the world secured once for all against their recurrence. What we demand in this war, therefore, is nothing peculiar to ourselves. It is that the world be made fit and safe to live in; and particularly that it be made safe for every peace-loving nation which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression. All the peoples of the world are in effect partners in this interest, and for our own part we see very clearly that unless justice be done to others it will not be done to us. The programme of the world's peace, therefore, is our programme; and that programme, the only possible programme, as we see it, is this:

I. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

II. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

III. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

IV. Adequate guarantees given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

V. A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the government whose title is to be determined.

VI. The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

VII. Belgium, the whole world will agree, must be evacuated and restored, without any attempt to limit the sovereignty which she enjoys in common with all other free nations. No other single act will serve as this will serve to restore confidence among the nations in the laws which they have themselves set and determined for the government of their relations with one another. Without this healing act the whole structure and validity of international law is forever impaired.

VIII. All French territory should be freed and the invaded portions restored, and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine, which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly fifty years, should be righted, in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all.

IX. A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality.

X. The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development.

XI. Rumania, Serbia, and Montenegro should be evacuated; occupied territories restored; Serbia accorded free and secure access to the sea; and the relations of the several Balkan states to one another determined by friendly counsel along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality; and international guarantees of the political and economic independence and territorial integrity of the several Balkan states should be entered into.

XII. The Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, but the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development, and the Dardanelles should be permanently opened as a free passage to the ships and commerce of all nations under international guarantees.

XIII. An independent Polish state should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea, and whose political and economic independence and territorial integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant.

XIV. A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small states alike.

In regard to these essential rectifications of wrong and assertions of right we feel ourselves to be intimate partners of all the governments and peoples associated together against the Imperialists. We cannot be separate in interest or divided in purpose. We stand together until the end.

For such arrangements and covenants we are willing to fight and to continue to fight until they are achieved; but only because we wish the right to prevail and desire a just and stable peace such as can be secured only by removing the chief provocations to war, which this programme does remove. We have no jealousy of German greatness, and there is nothing in this programme that impairs it. We grudge her no achievement or distinction of learning or of pacific enterprise such as have made her record very bright and very enviable. We do not wish to injure her or to block in any way her legitimate influence or power. We do not wish to fight her either with arms or with hostile arrangements of trade if she is willing to associate herself with us and the other peace-loving nations of the world in covenants of justice and law and fair dealing. We wish her only to accept a place of equality among the peoples of the world,—the new world in which we now live,—instead of a place of mastery.

Neither do we presume to suggest to her any alteration or modification of her institutions. But it is necessary, we must frankly say, and necessary as a preliminary to any intelligent dealings with her on our part, that we should know whom her spokesmen speak for when they speak to us, whether for the Reichstag majority or for the military party and the men whose creed is imperial domination.

We have spoken now, surely, in terms too concrete to admit of any further doubt or question. An evident principle runs through the whole programme I have outlined. It is the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities, and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be strong or weak. Unless this principle be made its foundation no part of the structure of international justice can stand. The people of the United States could act upon no other principle; and to the vindication of this principle they are ready to devote their lives, their honor, and everything that they possess. The moral climax of this the culminating and final war for human liberty has come, and they are ready to put their own strength, their own highest purpose, their own integrity and devotion to the test.

SUPPLY OF PRINT PAPER.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 101, the unfinished business, be taken up and proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of print paper at a fair price and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senate will indulge me with its attention I will briefly—and I hope clearly—explain the purpose of the joint resolution now before us for consideration, and the abuses which led up to the favorable report by the Committee on Printing, which I have had placed on the desks of Senators for a more detailed history of the facts than I feel justified in giving in the brief time I shall consume in this statement of the case.

First. The resolution authorizes the Federal Trade Commission to supervise and control and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States, and all mills making either in the United States shall be operated on Government account during the war, and the products equitably distributed at a fair price by the commission to the Government and other users of the commodity.

As to that I have offered amendments, as the reprint of the joint resolution to-morrow will show.

Second. The President is authorized to secure the cooperation of Canada in the creation of a similar agency, and the Trade Commission empowered to act in conjunction with such agency to fully effectuate the objects of this act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me? What will be the status of this matter if Canada declines to proceed along the line the joint resolution proposes we shall adopt?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It would result probably in a refusal to permit Canada to import, as the joint resolution further provides.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator really think that we will ever reach that point?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not think we will.

Mr. GALLINGER. To prohibit the importation of anything from the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not think there will be the least trouble. Canada is selling to-day for 2½ cents to their papers and selling to the American papers at 9 and 10 cents.

Mr. GALLINGER. And equally so with American manufacturers.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know; but we stopped them in a suit; and they pleaded guilty and paid a fine.

Third. The President can, during the war, prevent the importation of print paper or pulp from Canada, except such as is consigned to our Government account, whenever he shall determine such step necessary to effectuate the objects of this act.

Fourth. Plenary power is given the Trade Commission in the premises and severe penalties imposed on those persons or firms failing to comply with the provisions of this act.

It will be observed on reading the resolution that it is made to conform to the views of Congress as expressed in the food-control act in authorizing suits in the United States Court in case the price set by the commission is deemed unfair to the manufacturer. The penalty clause of the resolution finds a just precedent in the national defense act, where like penalties are prescribed in the purchase of military supplies.

Mr. President, there is no doubt of the great and extraordinary powers conferred on the Government of the United States and its instrumentalities in this resolution—powers which if proposed in time of peace or under normal conditions would find no advocate on this floor. But this is no time of peace, and every condition is intensely abnormal. A free press in a Government like ours is absolutely essential not only to the preservation of our liberties but to our very existence as a Government. It is essential as a war measure that the press of the country shall not be suppressed. The general enlightenment of the people is the only guarantee of perpetuity of this Republic. At this time under these conditions, where patriotic nerve is strained to meet the almost boundless requirements of our country not only in personal service, in taxes, but in life offering itself, we stand appalled before that infamy that would reap personal unearned gain from the country's distress. I have as much respect for a common thief—yes, more than I have for any man or set of men who raise at this time the price of any needed commodity above a fair and legitimate profit. The poor and hungry thief may have some excuse for stealing bread, and his case appeals to human sympathy; but the rich thief, who does not need to plunder, yet steals from the public without mercy and without shame merely to swell his own plethoric pocket and roll in more opulence amid the envy and pain of surrounding want, deserves as little mercy as he shows for others as he moves along this path so nearly touching treason.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator recalls the fact that when this joint resolution was introduced and when it was reported I was absent from the city in consequence of illness. I wish to ask the Senator, because I have not the information at hand, whether any hearing was had on the joint resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There was. The members of the Trade Commission were before the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. But were the parties interested, the paper manufacturers and dealers, invited to appear before the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They were not. They were invited to appear before the commission at the time of the report. On the part of the committee, on my part at least, there was no inclination to extend an invitation to them to appear when they had already been invited to appear before the Trade Commission and give all the reasons they had, if any, against the report of the commission and against this proposed legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will ask the Senator further, if he will permit me, if the interested parties were heard before the Trade Commission, was that hearing put in print?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the testimony those men gave available?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We have the report of the commission itself and the correspondence between them.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the opinion of the Trade Commission, but was the position that those men took, with the representations they made to the Trade Commission, ever put in print?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no doubt it was. I do not know whether it was or not.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not been able to find it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will tell you what was put into the matter to show what they themselves confess they did, and that they themselves rendered a plea of nolle contendere in one of the most infamous trusts and robberies ever perpetrated upon the American people.

Mr. GALLINGER. The word "trust" is a familiar one.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will show that before I get through, if the Senator will bear with me.

The price of print paper becoming so high and no just cause appearing for the great increase in price, the Senate on April 24, 1916, by resolution directed the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation of the news-print industries and ascertain whether the price demanded for print paper was justified. The report of the commission is found in Senate Document 49. Read that report and see to what extent impudent and lawless greed can go. The Senator will be enlightened if he will obtain a copy of it. The facts set forth in this report caused the indictment of the members of the News Print Manufacturers' Association in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, and on trial which occurred on the 26th of November, 1917, certain of the defendants on a plea of nolle contendere, were found guilty of violation of the antitrust law, and by a consent judgment the defendants Ed. W. Backus, representing two companies; George H. Meade, Spanish River Co.; George Cahoon, Laurentide Co.; F. J. Sensenbrener and Philip T. Dodge, International Paper Co., were found guilty and fined in the sum of $2,500 each and the trust known as the News Print Manufacturers' Association was dissolved by decree of the court and the defendants entered into an agreement of record whereby they were bound until April 1, 1918, to furnish the print paper to the users thereof in rolls by carload lots at $3 per hundred pounds, f. o. b., and that after said date they would furnish their product at a price to be fixed by the Government, through the Trade Commission.

That this agreement does not give adequate relief is clearly set forth in the following letter received by me from Mr. Colver, of the Trade Commission:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, December 13, 1917.

Hon. MARCUS A. SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We have received your letters of December 8 and December 11, 1917, in regard to the advisability of action on Senate resolution 101. The copy of our letter to Senator KELLOGG, which I took the liberty of forwarding to you, was not sent in response to your inquiry of December 8, but because I knew that you would be interested in our view regarding this matter, being the author of the bill which embodies substantially the recommendations made in our final report.

The letter to Senator KELLOGG, however, covers the matter pretty fully. The agreement which the Department of Justice entered into with certain news-print manufacturers relates only to the price of their news-print paper. It gives no control over the price or distribution of other grades of printing paper, such as book paper, and no control over the price and distribution of chemical and mechanical pulp, which are the principal materials used in making paper. Thus far only three companies in the United States and six or seven in Canada have joined in the agreement. Our last information is that one of the Canadian companies which signed the agreement is undertaking to disavow the act of its representative and withdraw its consent.

The necessity for the enactment of your bill depends upon the conditions of production and consumption which shall prevail and in these abnormal times it seems impossible to foretell accurately what changes the next few months will bring. The best informed persons in the industry differ radically regarding the future course of the market. Because of the uncertainties in the situation it seems to us that the wisest course is to have this legislation enacted at the earliest opportunity. If the commission finds that it can control the situation without the exercise of the powers granted thereby, it will not invoke them. The mere possession of such powers to be used in case of emergency would in itself help to give assurance and stabilize conditions.

If you should desire to have us do so, we would be glad to appear before your committee at any time to give whatever information we can relative to this matter.

Very truly, yours,
WILLIAM B. COLVER,
Commissioner.

The letter sent to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] is as follows:

DECEMBER 6, 1917.

DEAR SIR: The commission has your inquiry of December 3, 1917, regarding the present status of the print-paper matter.

In connection with our investigation of the news-print-paper industry, we obtained certain records tending to show violation of the Sherman law, which were turned over to the Department of Justice in January, 1917. Largely on the basis of this evidence the Department of Justice secured indictments against a number of news-print-manufacturers in April, 1917. The case came to trial in November, and after the jury had been drawn a settlement was reached. The indicted manufacturers entered a plea of nolle contendere and signed an agreement with the Attorney General providing, among other things, that the price of their standard news print would be $3 per hundred pounds f. o. b. mill for rolls in carload lots from January 1 to April 1, 1918, after which date the price on all grades of news print should be determined by the Federal Trade Commission for the continuance of the war.

This agreement will give the commission control over the news-print-paper prices of three manufacturers in the United States and six or seven in Canada, who have signed it. The agreement gives the commission no control over the distribution of news-print paper or over the price and distribution of chemical and mechanical wood pulp, from which the paper is made. If as a result of abnormal conditions a severe shortage should occur the commission would be unable to prevent those publishers who were not protected by contracts from suspending publication. If, on the other hand, the production keeps pace with consumption the powers conferred upon the commission by the agreement will be sufficient to accomplish much good.

It may be that your inquiry is moved by the pending Smith bill, which was reported favorably by the Committee on Printing. The commission feels that the enactment of this bill will be of great benefit. Should conditions improve and become tolerable the law need not be invoked; should they become intolerable, on the other hand, it will be well to have the law ready to hand. If the law is enacted that very fact will tend to make its invocation unnecessary.

Very truly, yours,
FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

I see no need of amplifying the statement thus clearly made in these letters. The decree dissolving the trust and the agreement between the manufacturers and the Government each went a great way in breaking the strangle hold these "gentlemen" had on the throats of their victims, but did not by any means give the full relief to which the Government and all other purchasers of print paper were and are entitled.

The intolerable condition of the print-paper purchasers before the report of the Trade Commission was made public is fully set forth in Senate Report No. 49, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, and the facts are also fairly well collected in the report on this resolution.

I have these facts to which I have just alluded before me, and I read them.

Before submitting its report to the Senate the Trade Commission undertook an arbitration between the manufacturers of print paper and the publishers whereby immediate relief might be had on a basis that would prevent serious financial distress and injury to the publishers and at the same time assure a fair compensation to the manufacturers of paper. In the course of this negotiation the principal manufacturers of news-print paper submitted a formal proposition to the commission requesting it to fix upon a fair and reasonable price for their product and agreeing to abide by such findings. The commission promptly fixed upon 2½ cents per pound, car lots, f. o. b. mill, as a fair and reasonable price for news-print paper, but, subsequent to this finding, several of the largest manufacturers withdrew from the arbitration and no substantial or permanent relief has yet been obtained for the newspaper publishers. However, the Government itself has profited from the findings of the Trade Commission in that the President, at the suggestion of the Joint Committee on Printing, has exercised his authority under the national-defense act to purchase news-print paper required for certain war publications at the price fixed upon by the Trade Commission. Therefore it seems all the more important that Congress should not delay longer in securing the same measure of justice for the newspaper publishers of the country.

There are 2,000 small dailies and some 14,000 weekly newspapers in the United States that have to depend largely on the open market for their supplies of news print. In the latter part of 1916 many of these smaller papers had extreme difficulty in obtaining a supply of paper except at prices which, if maintained, will drive them out of business, and yet the Federal Trade Commission, which spent more than a year investigating the news-print situation, reports to Congress that—

> The efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions in the news-print industry expeditiously and to arbitrate and effectively project a fair price for news-print paper have failed.

The Federal Trade Commission in its report states that at prices now prevailing news print will cost the publishers in 1917 more than $105,000,000, which is an increase of $35,000,000. or 50 per cent. The commission further declares that one-half of this $35,000,000 increase in paper cost, or $17,500,000, alone represents additional profits to the manufacturers.

VAST PROFITS OF PAPER COMPANIES.

The International Paper Co., of New York, which produces nearly 40 per cent of the news print made in the United States. and thereby largely fixes its price, is reported to have added $7,465,827 to its profits in 1916, an increase of $4,344,146 over its profits for 1915. It is likewise interesting to note that the common stock of the International Paper Co. jumped from 9½ to 75½ in 1916 and recently was quoted around 35, while its preferred stock ranged in 1916 from 42½ to 109½, the current quotations being about 65. Unless Congress takes some such action as here proposed, the International will likewise get the lion's share out of the $17,500,000 of additional profits, which the Federal Trade Commission reports are in sight this year for the news-print manufacturers.

In connection with the vast profits now being made by the manufacturers of news-print paper the report of the committee on paper of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association states:

> There is not a single paper mill which has been built in the United States or Canada in the last 10 years which has not made 15 to 20 per cent on the money invested. The very fact that stock jobbers and watered-stock promoters are able to get away with so much in the paper business is prima facie evidence that the margins are more than liberal. Many companies have millions of dollars of water stock, which was only promotion and organization bonus stock. Under the liberal profits being made this stock is in many cases worth away above par.

That the News Print Manufacturers' Association at the time of the indictment of its members was an impudent, lawless, unconscionable trust is fully shown in the record of the trial of these freebooters. The indictment to which the defendants entered the plea "nolo contendere" set forth the following amazing facts. They agreed among themselves in carrying on their business and trade—

(a) To refrain from competing with each other for new customers for their paper;

(b) To refrain from competing with each other as to the quality of paper to be sold in said trade and commerce;

(c) To refrain from competing with each other as to delivery of, and furnishing storage for, paper sold but not delivered;

(d) To refrain from competing with each other as to terms of credit, rate of interest upon open accounts, the dates of the beginning and ending of contract years, the methods of making sales of such paper through salesmen, dealers, and jobbers, the payment of return freight upon the cores upon which their paper should be wrapped, payment of charges for cartage, and allowing of claims for waste or damaged paper;

(e) To engage in simultaneous representations to the public, to their customers, and to each other, of alleged increased cost of manufacture and of alleged shortages of such paper;

(f) To manufacture insufficient quantities of such paper;

(g) To cooperate in discouraging the erection of new mills or the installation of new machinery for the manufacture of such paper;

(h) To cooperate in preventing new concerns from competing with the corporate defendants by transferring orders and contracts for such paper to new concerns on condition that such new concerns should not compete with the corporate defendants;

(i) To cooperate in preventing other manufacturers of news-print paper from competing with the corporate defendants;

(j) To furnish from time to time to said News Print Manufacturers' Association, at 18 East Forty-first Street, in the Borough of Manhattan, and in said southern district of New York, for the information of the individual defendants. Full and complete information and data concerning their contracts with their customers and the quantity of such paper manufactured, carried in stock, or sold by them in relation to the capacity of their several plants and other details of their several businesses.

BAR TO COMPETITION.

(6) The corporate defendants submitted to such regulations, rules, and decisions, in the carrying on of their said trade and commerce, notwithstanding the fact that because the corporate defendants were independent of each other, they should and, but for said unlawful combination, they would have competed freely and fully with each other as to all said matters and should and would have conducted their said trade and commerce free from such regulations, rules, and decisions.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I wish to ask the Senator when these associaticns reached this agreement among themselves, if he knows?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Here it is [exhibiting]. I have the proceedings of the trial contained in the Editor and Publisher. It is as follows:

> In the spring of 1915, at the suggestion of the defendant, Sensenbrenner, and with the cooperation of the other defendants, the organization which they had up to that time was done away with and this new organization was inaugurated, known as the News Print Manufacturers' Association, and Steele was appointed as its manager, at the rather moderate stipend, considering his duties, of $24,000 a year salary.

They did not know whether they ought to incorporate or not, in order to carry out the purposes, but they concluded to act as a company without incorporation, and appointed a general manager and five directors. They sent directions to each of the paper manufacturers to return reports on the cost of producing paper, and not to be particular in making it too low, but to report to the world the highest possible cost they could squeeze out of it, so as to show the necessity for this raise which they contemplated and the raise that they did make.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona further yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly the statement which the Senator has made is a most remarkable one and discloses a remarkable condition of affairs which it is the duty of this Congress to put an end to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Here [exhibiting] is what one of the investigators states, and it is stated by the attorney who tried the case also:

> I have calculated, in the light of the Federal Trade Commission's report, that these defendants, the news-print manufacturers, have reaped a profit of at least $15,000,000 in a short period of time; and it seems to me that to let anybody else throughout this industrial country know that in order to make $15,000,000 worth of exorbitant profits in contravention of the law, all you have to do is to incur a fine of $5,000.

They agreed to pay $2,500 and have the case dismissed, and that they would enter into this agreement, which they did enter into with the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if this very astonishing agreement which he has read to the Senate was in writing and signed by the parties to it?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; it was not in writing signed by the parties, but it was ascertained from the facts which were disclosed by the record, and which the Trade Commission found did exist, and it was made the charge in the indictment in which they plead nolle contendere. They have not denied a line of it nor have they denied a single one of the facts which were set out in the report of the Trade Commission, to which I have alluded, when they were indicted and appeared in court, nor from that day to this have they denied a single allegation of fact which the Trade Commission has made against them, even as to the absolutely unearned profits of $17,000,000 which they reaped.

Their conduct is particularly conspicuous in comparison with the views expressed by other American business men who, at the recent Atlantic City convention of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, adopted resolutions urging Government price fixing for all essential products, not only in sales to the Government but to the public as well, and advocating a general Government purchasing department, which, in addition to fixing prices, would have power to distribute the output of industries in a manner most necessary to the conduct of the war. The resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States gave further expressions to the loyalty of the business men, as follows:

It is the spirit of American business, that however fundamental may be the change in the relation of Government to business, the Government should have the power during the period of the war to control prices and the distribution of production for public and private needs to whatever extent may be necessary for our great national purpose.

The resolution giving the Federal Trade Commission power to supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper is in full accord with the position taken by these patriotic American business men at their Atlantic City convention.

The demand for favorable action on the pending resolution comes from nearly every newspaper in the country.

I had presented to me this morning a petition from newspapers of every State in the Union, and I think from every congressional district, and they are not half of those who have also petitioned for the passage of this joint resolution, as they have said, through the trade press. I have copies of the petitions somewhere in my desk of 800 or more of the local newspapers which have paid or attempted to pay the price these people were charging them and whose editors are asking relief from these unconscionable exactions.

The press of the country and the Government itself are entitled to fair play and just treatment in regard to this great necessary product. This resolution will afford proper relief without injury to just trade.

By indorsing the proposition for Government control over the production and distribution of print paper during the war the newspaper publishers have indicated that they have no fear whatever of the Government censorship under such plan. What the newspapers do fear, and justly so, is that their very existence may be placed in jeopardy by the paper combine, which already, by its greed for excessive profits, has forced hundreds of the smaller newspapers throughout the country to discontinue publication. Could any Government censorship be more drastic or fatal to a free press than that which the indicted paper clique already has exercised for their own selfish interest?

The committee submits the resolution for the consideration of the Senate with the question whether it is better to safeguard the continuance of a free press in this country by assuring it an adequate supply of print paper at a fair and reasonable price or whether to permit a further increase in the excessive profits of the paper industry, which the Federal Trade Commission declares is about to exact $17,500,000 more in excessive profits from the American publishers who are loyally and patriotically supporting their Government in this fateful hour?

Mr. LEWIS. Seventeen million dollars annually?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir; $17,000,000 annually; $13,000,000 or so in about six months.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate much longer, but there is one thing to which I should like to call attention before I forget it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If he desires to put something more into the RECORD, I shall not interrupt until he does so.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have not given up the floor at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, and I beg to reassure the Senator from Arizona, I do not propose to present any factious opposition to this measure. If it is wise, I want to vote for it just as much as does the Senator from Arizona; but I want some information. In the daily press of Washington I find this clipping:

Commissioner W. B. Colver, of the Federal Trade Commission, announced to-day—

That was two days ago, I think—that plans were rapidly maturing for the hearings beginning January 7 in connection with the news-print price agreement, which several manufacturers recently made with the Department of Justice. A general invitation has been extended to all publishers and jobbers to participate and from replies it is expected a large number will attend. The manufacturers will present information supplementary to their cost reports bearing on such matters as the hazards of the business, methods of determined wood costs, and depreciation charges. It is probable that information will also be given on what is a fair investment in the business and what is a fair rate of profit on such investment.

The afternoon of January 9—

That is to-morrow—

has been set for a conference with the jobbers, at which the provisions of the agreement in which they are interested will be considered.

So it seems, Mr. President, that while we are considering this joint resolution the Federal Trade Commission is having a hearing, and they are having a hearing, as I understand—if I am wrong the Senator from Arizona will correct me—on an agreement that was reached between the Attorney General of the United States and the manufacturers and jobbers of news-print paper that they will furnish during the war news-print paper at a price satisfactory to the Department of Justice. Is that a fact?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Not altogether. It is true that the investigation is still going on. There is, however, no necessity for investigation in regard to the agreement, for that is of record. That agreement promised on the part of the paper makers that they would furnish paper f. o. b. at 3 cents a pound at the mill up to the 1st day of April next, and, in consideration of the dismissal of the indictment, when they accepted a moderate fine and the dissolution of their trust, they agreed that after the 1st day of April the Federal Government, through the Federal Trade Commission, should set the price of roll print paper. It applies to nothing else. I have a letter received a few days ago from Mr. Colver in regard to the joint resolution itself, and I saw him yesterday.

I imagine that what the Post alludes to is that there may be under way a preliminary investigation as to what is the fairest and best thing to do when this agreement of record shall have expired. I imagine that is the reference. Otherwise the Trade Commission is anxious for the passage of this measure. It is less drastic than originally drawn, as the Senator will perceive from the amendments which have been offered to the joint resolution. It has no purpose to take control, except where it becomes essential to take control. So, I take it, that the proposed legislation very much will relieve the situation. Mr. Colver, of the Trade Commission, hoped that with the power given them they could probably negotiate with the paper men, acting in perfect frankness, and they could set reasonable prices, satisfactory both to the publishers and to the manufacturers of paper. My hope is that they can do so, and I believe they will do so. I am certain they can do so under this resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that they can do so without passing this joint resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No, sir; for two of the gentlemen in the agreement, or one of them at least, already, as I am informed, has been trying to back out of it; and I see also that 67 or 68, instead of 6 or 7, have now begun to join together in some kind of an understanding. The dissolution of the Paper Trust strikes me on its face as being something like the dissolution of the Beef Trust, when the packers quit the Beef Trust, but became a Stockyards Trust, which is much more prolific of trouble than was the original trust.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will join with the Senator in the expressed belief that the dissolution of the great trusts has not done the American people much good.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Not much.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, I want to ask the Senator one or two questions——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. What trust has been dissolved?

Mr. GALLINGER. We have been told that the Standard Oil Trust was dissolved on a certain occasion, although I believe the Standard Oil Co. has prospered more than ever before because of that wonderful dissolution that took place. I wanted to ask the Senator from Arizona one or two other practical questions, and I do not do it to annoy the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I appreciate that fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is always courteous, and I want to be equally so. Has the Senator information that at the present time print paper is being sold in the United States at from one-half to one-third of the price which is being paid for it in Great Britain to-day?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know that is not true, so far as the record and the investigations made in respect to Canada show. In that country print paper is sold a good deal cheaper than in the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am talking about Great Britain.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I presume that Great Britain has great difficulty in getting news-print paper at any price. I doubt whether she can get it at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. One other point: The Senator has improved the joint resolution beyond a doubt by the amendments which he has offered. Has the Senator given very careful consideration to the question of withholding a portion of the price and sending these people to the courts to establish their rights to some added compensation? The Senator is a business man and he must know that that provision will work great hardship to these people. They may not get money enough to pay the cost of manufacture if they only get two-thirds, and they will probably be forced into the market to secure capital, which is not an easy matter to do at the present time. The Senator may not answer this, but I want him to give consideration to the question whether or not when the Government or somebody arbitrarily fixes the price at which these people shall sell their product and they have no redress from that they ought not to be given the entire amount awarded to them by this arbitrary tribunal?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; I do not think so, and I do not think the Senator will think so if he will reflect a moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have reflected.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It would cause them to begin speculating in the decisions of the courts from the very start; they would get all the money accorded them and gamble on getting more. It is a matter of merely providing that a fair amount of the money shall be held back. I am not particular about the amount being 25 per cent. If that is thought to be too much, let it be changed, although, as a general rule, in dealing with the Government on disputed accounts that is the amount withheld. A provision to that effect has been put in several bills recently.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been done in some cases, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I presume the Senator is alluding probably to the fact set forth by the grand mogul of the paper companies, Mr. Philip T. Dodge, the president of the International Paper Co., in which he states, in a letter of recent date, that no mill in America could remain out of bankruptcy under this provision. If they were getting full compensation—grant that they were—and they concluded that they wanted to sue, as it is not impossible with men who did what these gentleman did to get money, they would probably not hesitate to sue for all they thought they could get.

In this connection, in regard to injuring the industry, I should like to say, in answer to Mr. Dodge's letter—and if I had had time I would have answered him respectfully—that these people never denied one fact brought out by the Trade Commission. I am informed that they were asked to come before the Trade Commission, and that their own financial reports show that their profits were just about what the Trade Commission said they were; that is, some $17,000,000, or in excess of 19 per cent. They did not deny the allegation that they made a profit of this amount. I thought perhaps that out of the $17,000,000—and $13,000,000 previously—they had probably saved enough to enable them to stand the holding back of 25 per cent on a disputed account. However, I am not so anxious that the amount withheld shall be 25 per cent. All I want is something to deter them from gambling in lawsuits and that is all it amounts to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the Senator say that he has not fixed in his mind that the amount ought to be 25 per cent. These men may have saved a good deal of money. I do not know anything about that; but they have been in the hands of the Attorney General, and the courts are open to prosecute them. They were found to be a trust. I do not know whether the trust was dissolved or not. I believe the Senator says it was; but I really do not think that in our legislation we ought to penalize them because they may have saved a little money, which very likely they have lost between that time and now, for they may have gone into some other speculation that was not so profitable.

I simply wanted the Senator's opinion on that point, and he has given it frankly. I do think that it may prove to be a great hardship, especially to the smaller concerns—and we have a great many of them in the United States—to be compelled to live under a provision—a penalizing clause, I would call it—that they can only be paid a portion of what is adjudged to be their right and that then they can go to the courts, and, if they can supply money enough and live long enough and employ lawyers enough, they may get something further.

Mr. President, I think upon candid reflection the Senator will not feel that he ought to disassociate the men who are engaged in this business from all the rest of the people of this country and declare them to be rogues and scoundrels and violators of law, and hence that they have no place before the Congress of the United States when they appeal to us to give them what they, I think, feel is fair play. I do not know one of them; I have not seen one of them, now or in the past, and hence I hold no brief for them. I want to vote fairly on this question, but I want to vote intelligently. That is the reason why I asked the questions that I have asked, and for no other purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think the Senator will bear me out, as far as he has noticed my record, in the statement that I have never been one of those yelling about somebody because he had money; but it is not altogether wrong, and I do not think even the subject of criticism, to call attention to the conduct of men who in the stress of occasions like this use their combined power to oppress. They certainly did it or they would not have paid the fines and consented to the dissolution of their organization as they did.

I shall incorporate the judgment of the court in that case in the RECORD with my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This cause came on to be heard at this term and was argued by counsel; and thereupon, upon consideration thereof, and upon the consents hereto in writing and in open court by the defendants, George H. Mead, Philip T. Dodge, George Chahoon, jr., Gordias H. P. Gould, Edward W. Backus, Alexander Smith, Frank J. Sensenbrenner, Abitibi Power & Paper Co. (Ltd.), Belgo-Canadian Pulp & Paper Co. (Ltd.), Brompton Pulp & Paper Co., Donnacona Paper Co. (Ltd.), Gould Paper Co., International Paper Co., Kimberly-Clark Co., Laurentide Co. (Ltd.), Minnesota & Ontario Power Co., Price Bros. & Co. (Ltd.), and Spanish River Pulp & Paper Mills (Ltd.), and upon the unanimous resolution of the executive committee of the News Print Manufacturers' Association consenting to the dissolution of said association and consenting to this decree, and said consents having been duly given by their respective solicitors to the entry of this decree before any testimony has been taken, it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed as to said defendants so consenting as follows, viz:

(1) Defendants, by becoming and acting as members of the News Print Manufacturers' Association, have entered into and engaged in an unlawful combination in restraint of trade and commerce in news-print paper among the several States and with foreign nations in violation of the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

(2) The News Print Manufacturers' Association is an unlawful combination of the defendants in restraint of the trade and commerce in news-print paper among the several States and with foreign nations in violation of said act of July 2, 1890, and said News Print Manufacturers' Association shall be, and it hereby is, dissolved.

(3) Each corporate defendant is hereby perpetually enjoined from carrying into further effect the combination hereby dissolved and from entering into or engaging in any like combination having for purpose or effect (a) the elimination or restriction by concert of action of competition in news-print paper, or (b) the concerted working for materially higher prices for news-print paper, or (c) the establishment by concert of action of uniform prices, terms, or conditions for the sale of news-print paper, or (d) the concerted working to discourage others from manufacturing news-print paper.

(4) Each corporate defendant is hereby perpetually enjoined from entering into any combination, agreement, understanding, or concert of action with any other corporate defendant or with any other manufacturer of news-print paper having for purpose or effect (a) to limit or restrict itself as to the customers to whom it should sell or offer to sell news-print paper, (b) to limit or restrict itself as to the quality or quantity of news-print paper it should make or sell, (c) to limit or restrict itself as to the service it should render to its customers or the prices, terms, or conditions upon which it should sell or offer to sell news-print paper.

(5) The injunctions herein contained against the corporate defendants shall apply to and be binding upon such corporations and their respective officers, directors, agents, and employees and all other persons, firms, or corporations acting under, for, or in behalf of them, or any of them, or claiming so to act.

(6) Each individual defendant is hereby perpetually enjoined from entering into, engaging in, or carrying into further effect any contract, combination, or conspiracy having for purpose or effect to regulate, dominate, or restrict the trade or commerce in news-print paper of any person, firm, or corporation other than the firms or corporations with which such individual defendant is or may be connected as an officer, agent, or employee.

(7) Nothing herein contained shall prevent the defendants from entering into and performing a certain contract of even date with the Attorney General of the United States, as trustee, made for the purpose of meeting the emergencies created by existing conditions and by the present state of war in the United States. Nothing herein contained shall be deemed an adjudication for or against the exercise of control by any corporate defendant of any of its subsidiaries as set forth in the petition, nor for or against the right of certain of the defendants or their subsidiaries to avail themselves of the services of the Canadian Export Paper Co. (Ltd.) or the G. H. Mead Co. or the Minnesota & Ontario Power Co. in the manner and to the extent now being availed of as set forth in the petition herein.

(8) The court retains jurisdiction to proceed against the defendants not hereby consenting to this decree and to enforce this decree and to enable any of the parties to apply to the court for modification hereof, if it be hereafter shown to the satisfaction of the court that by reason of changed conditions or changes in the statute law of the United States the provisions hereof have become inappropriate or inadequate to maintain competitive conditions in the interstate or foreign trade or commerce of the United States in news-print paper or have become unduly oppressive to defendants or any of them and are no longer necessary to secure or maintain competitive conditions in such trade or commerce.

Dated New York City, N. Y., November 26, 1917.

JULIUS M. MAYER,
United States District Judge for the Southern District of New York.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact, however, that the agreement that was made between the paper manufacturers and the Federal Trade Commission to sell paper at a certain price per pound was not violated by the paper manufacturers until after the Attorney General had begun suit against the very paper manufacturers that had entered into the agreement?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think the Senator is mistaken in that.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure I am not mistaken, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator may be right. I am not charging that he is not, but I have heard differently. I am not so confident about the sources of my information as the Senator himself may be, but I know that they did commence immediately violating the 2½-cent agreement. Whether or not it was done by reason of the Attorney General bringing suit and this indictment against them I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator that the agreement was repudiated by the paper manufacturers; but it was not repudiated until after the Attorney General had started suit against the very manufacturers that had entered into this agreement with the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; but that did not justify them in violating a subsequent contract.

Mr. SMOOT. They thought they were dealing with a part of the Government that had a perfect right to make the agreement, and another part of the Government immediately started suit against them as a trust and for the dissolution of the company.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, I want to ask the Senator another question in this connection while we are on the subject: Is it not a fact that the price of print paper—I mean the great bulk of it that is sold in the United States to-day—has not increased in price as great as many other commodities have increased in the United States since the breaking out of the war?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Oh, very likely; I do not know. I could not say whether that is true or not.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say now, for the RECORD, that that is the case.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If it be true that they have already killed a big part of the demand, I might account for it in that way.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish they could kill a great deal more of the demand for the purposes for which news-print paper is being used to-day. For instance, the Senator knows that on Sunday morning he can pick up a paper from any of the great cities of the United States and it is almost all he can do to put it under his arm, and all the real news that is in the paper could be printed in 12 pages.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is in the first 12 pages.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; as the Senator from Georgia suggests, it is in the first 12 pages.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Easily.

Mr. SMOOT. The Sunday papers consume nearly 20 per cent more paper than ought to be consumed by the press of this country.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am glad the Senator makes that criticism, in which I most heartily concur, for, in my judgment, if there ever was an exhibition of absolute waste, it is in these 50 and 60 and 70 page Sunday papers, with their Sunday magazines.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will not the Senator add to that the absolute and indefensible waste of which the Congress of the United States is guilty?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is not a doubt about that, either, and we ought to try as hard as we can to curtail it from now on. I certainly shall do whatever I can to accomplish it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is certainly the case, when we know to-day that the amount of paper that is to be purchased for the Government of the United States for the coming fiscal year has increased by 400 per cent in quantity——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think more than that.

Mr. SMOOT. Four hundred per cent in quantity; and as to the price, the advance runs all the way from 50 per cent up to 150 per cent, and in some particular instances higher than that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I only want to recur for a moment to those who have favored this legislation, aside from the thousands of petitioners that have written to the Congress, many of them to me, publishers all over the country.

The National Editorial Association, at its annual convention in Minneapolis on July 11 of last year, adopted resolutions urging the Federal Trade Commission to take over and operate American news-print mills and thus reduce the price of news-print paper. The Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, in convention at Asheville, N. C., about the same date, adopted a resolution on the same subject. Both of these I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Resolutions of National Editorial Association.]

Whereas for the past 18 months there has been a determined and persistent effort on the part of the print-paper manufacturers and jobbers to create a panic market for print paper; and

Whereas for several months they have succeeded in making the publishers believe that there was good and sufficient reasons for the extraordinary prices they were charging, but during the past seven or eight months it has been clearly demonstrated by the investigations of the Federal Trade Commission and by your legislative committee that there was, and is, no good reason for the large advances made, as the Trade Commission clearly demonstrated that there had been but a very slight increase in the cost of manufacture: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Editorial Association in convention assembled at Minneapolis calls upon Congress to pass legislation immediately that will give the Federal Trade Commission power to fix prices and operate the mills and distribute the print paper manufactured in the United States during the period of the present war in accordance with the recommendations of the Trade Commission in its report to Congress; and further be it

Resolved, That arrangements be made with the Canadian Government so that the print paper manufactured in Canada and shipped into this country shall also be handled by the Trade Commission in order that all the publishers of the United States may be provided with sufficient paper at a reasonable price.

[Resolution of Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association.]

Resolved, That the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, representing 105 leading daily newspapers of the South, in convention assembled, unqualifiedly approves and strongly urges the immediate adoption of the complete plans of the print-paper committee of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association to empower the Federal Trade Commission by legislative enactment to control the production of news-print paper, to pool its distribution, and to fix its price.

This action is absolutely neecssary to conserve the best interest of our Government and our people under the present extraordinary emergency.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Georgia Weekly Press Association likewise adopted a resolution at its meeting in Thomasville, Ga., on July 16 to 18, indorsing the action of the Federal Trade Commission in urging Government control of print paper.

The New York State Press Association at its meeting in Ithaca on June 29 adopted a resolution indorsing the action of the Federal Trade Commission in recommending Government control of print-paper mills; and various others have done likewise.

Mr. Hosmer, chairman of the legislative committee of the National Editorial Association, says:

The smaller newspapers are particularly thankful to the Trade Commission at this time for the paper they have furnished them since last April, even though the big manufacturers, who agreed to furnish paper at a reasonable price, failed. Independent mills have furnished the paper through the commission to newspapers in more than 20 States at prices from 25 to 33⅓ per cent under the prices quoted by jobbers and mills direct. In some cases this paper has been distributed through designated jobbers, who have been paid about 10 per cent for handling; in other cases through State associations or committees from associations, who have handled it as a patriotic duty, without expense to the newspaper men.

The Canadian Government, at the time of this finding of the Trade Commission, had undertaken to control the production and distribution of news-print paper through its orders in council; and I hear that the government of each one of the nations now at war has control of its news-print paper.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, they virtually control it by controlling the size of the issue of every paper and every publication.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But the Canadian Government has undertaken to control the production and distribution of news-print paper through its orders in council.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is stated that a pool is actually in existence in Canada, the news-print manufacturers selling to Canadian publishers at $2.50 per hundred and charging $3 per hundred when shipped outside of Canada. In this connection it is interesting to note that $2.50 is the price that the Federal Trade Commission has fixed upon as a fair and reasonable price for news-print paper in this country—that is, at the time to which the Senator alludes. In comparison with this price the Trade Commission reports that the largest consumers of news-print paper have had to pay from $3 to $3.50 per hundred pounds, and in some cases even as high as $4.50, while the small publishers have been forced to pay prices as high as $7.50 to $9 per hundred f. o. b. mill. This same paper, before the war started, sold generally at $2 per hundred pounds.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that connection I want to say that Canada is treating the United States, in the selling of her paper, just opposite to the way we have been trying to treat our allies in selling products that are shipped to them from this country. For instance, we put a price upon copper of 23½ cents per pound. We sell it to all of our allies at 23½ cents a pound. England buys it at 23½ cents a pound from the United States; and yet, at the same time, for copper produced in Canada she pays 29 and 30 cents a pound, and for copper produced in Mexico, in the case of purchases made upon the same day, instead of 23½ cents a pound she has paid as high as thirty-odd cents a pound.

Mr. FERNALD. Does the Senator refer to the United States Government?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I refer to England. Everybody purchases it from us for 23½ cents a pound. In other words, we are trying to sell our allies our products just as low as it is possible to sell them, while our allies are forcing us to pay as high prices as possible and more than she charges her own people, as in the case cited here by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question before he takes his seat?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How can the machinery of this joint resolution be carried into execution? The Trade Commission is to take the paper. It can not take it without paying for it; and then it must sell it. Is any money provided for the Trade Commission with which it can make this first payment? Is it to go into the general business of buying and selling all this paper? And if so, where is the capital provided?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Where is the capital in the case of coal? Where is the capital in the war-products bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The coal bill does not provide for purchasing and selling coal, if the Senator will allow the suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; it does.

Mr. SMOOT. There are also appropriations made there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia: Yes; the food-control bill contains an appropriation of $100,000,000. I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me. I just want to have the joint resolution in such shape that it will work.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not misunderstand the Senator; not at all. I am glad of the interruption. I think we need it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not opposing the legislation. It seems to me there is simply no machinery to execute this joint resolution as it is drawn, and that the Trade Commission would have no power to do anything under it except to stop the paper manufacturers' business. Would it not be better to permit the Trade Commission to fix the price, and not interfere with the business of any company that accepts the price, but let it go on in a normal way, dealing directly with its customers rather than with the United States Government?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Here is the purpose that I get from those who expect to try to handle it: They believe that under the power given them they can establish fair and legitimate prices after an investigation of the costs. They can see that the paper is fairly distributed and not given to one place and refused to another. The power rests in them. The provision is that the mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States shall be operated on Government account, and that these products shall be pooled in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Nothing of that sort is done with reference to coal.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It has not been done yet, but it can be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the Government has the right to take the mines and operate them and do the work itself, but the fuel administration has no power to take all the coal in the United States and distribute it; and the food control has an appropriation of $100,000,000 with which to conduct its business with reference to foodstuffs. It seems to me that without some amendment this measure is calculated to stop the business and to give nobody any means of obtaining the goods for distribution. The Interstate Trade Commission can not get them without paying 75 per cent of the value. They have no money with which to pay the 75 per cent. They have no authority and machinery for distribution. They must go into the general business of buying and selling. They can not distribute without pay. Most of the newspapers buy on time. A great many of them do. Is the Trade Commission to determine the credit of every newspaper in the country and sell on time? All these delicate details, it seems to me, we ought to settle in this legislation and in the joint resolution before we pass it.

While I am on my feet there is one further provision to which I wish to call attention. It is in line 7, page 2, where it is provided that the legislation shall continue in force "for the term of the war and the emergency occasioned thereby." I am opposed to leaving any such language as "emergency occasioned thereby" in any legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not care for that at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to take that out.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not care; let it come out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have been sitting here studying it, and I have had this bill brought to my attention by my friends who want something of the sort, who feel that they have been greatly oppressed by what has been going on. My suggestion is, first, that if the Trade Commission is authorized to fix the price, then we ought not to interfere with the business of anybody who accepts that price.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, if I understand the matter correctly, the Attorney General has made an agreement with the manufacturers and dealers in print paper that the Federal Trade Commission may fix the price, and both sides have agreed to that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understood that they violated the agreement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not this last agreement. They made an agreement, and subsequently to the agreement it is claimed that the Attorney General instituted legal proceedings against the manufacturers, and they jumped the agreement after the legal proceedings were instituted by the Attorney General. The two branches of the Government did not act in harmony, so it is claimed. I do not know what the facts are in that respect. What I want is to see a measure passed which will practically work out fairly to everybody and be a real protection to those who must use paper against unjust combinations and extortionate prices.

My first suggestion is that if the Trade Commission is to fix the price those who accept the price should go on with their business with their customers without interference. As I understand this language, it proposes that the Trade Commission shall take over the paper product of the United States and resell it. It does not give them the money to buy it. It does not provide the machinery for the resale. It does not say whether they shall resell at the same price.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The only purpose of the measure, I will say to the Senator, was that in case of necessity it was to be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ought there not to be at least this kind of a provision, that any company accepting the rate fixed by the Trade Commission shall be permitted to go on with its business without any interference at all?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is the object of two or three of my amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not studied the amendments; I have just studied the original joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am obliged to the Senator for his comment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope that the great bulk of companies will accept, if they have not already agreed to do so. They agreed once before, and some kind of a dispute arose that broke up the agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall not take the time to-day to discuss the provisions of the pending joint resolution for I want to see the amendments the Senator from Arizona has offered to it and what effect they will have upon it, but as they were read from the desk I hardly think that they correct the measure in a way that it can possibly be administered. The joint resolution says:

> That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered to supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States, and that all mills producing and all agencies distributing print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States shall be operated on Government account; that these products be pooled in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission for the term of the war and the emergency occasioned thereby and equitably distributed at a price based upon cost of production and distribution plus a fair profit per ton, as determined by the Federal Trade Commission.

The Senator knows that there are thousands of little papers, weekly papers and little magazines, published in small towns throughout the country that do not use half a car of paper in a year. They buy their paper from the local paper distributor, and those distributors are in every large city in the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And they have charged most enormous profits.

Mr. SMOOT. Some of them, and some of them no doubt charged a reasonable profit. I know small papers that can not buy even a roll of paper at a time. I know they have actually asked that the rolls be divided, and not only that but their credit is such that it is absolutely impossible for them to buy more than what is required for the actual issue, and they issue once a week or once a month, as the case may be. I do not believe that there are 5 per cent of the newspapers of the United States that pay cash for their paper. They are given 30 days' time, some of them 60 days' time, and with many of them special arrangements are made by which they are carried by the distributor of paper for a longer period than 60 days.

Under the joint resolution there is no provision whatever to meet a situation of that kind. If the Federal Trade Commission is going to undertake to distribute print paper as the joint resolution provides, we shall have employed not a thousand or two thousand or three thousand men under the Trade Commission but so many thousand that I can not predict what the number would be.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator does not permit me to tell him.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will yield to the Senator at any time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. All the matter of which the Senator speaks right now is modified by the proposed amendments that have been offered.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator read the amendment that modifies it?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will read a few of them right now in the order they come.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the one that takes care of this very point.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona (reading)—

That whenever during the continuance of the war and for six months thereafter the President shall deem it needful, he may direct the Federal Trade Commission to supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp and their products in the United States, and that such mills producing and such agencies distributing print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp and their products in the United States as the President shall designate shall be operated on Government account—

And so forth.

This shows that it can not affect all the small people, except as the President shall designate, that a particular one shall be taken. It gives more latitude. Instead of turning over every newspaper plant in America it only turns over the recalcitrant ones—the disobedient ones—and those who are combining for the purpose of making a bigger price for their product.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment has the effect of taking out of the Federal Trade Commission the authority and giving it to the President of the United States, and to authorize the Federal Trade Commission to put it in force.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It does not. It gives the President of the United States power to designate any cases, and very probably they will report to him. As the Senator knows very well, it must pass through the commission of necessity.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the President of the United States can or should say to this mill, "You shall sell your paper to Tom Jones at such and such a price"——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. "And deliver so much paper to him every day, and you shall extend credit to him for 60 days or 90 days, and in case Tom Jones can not buy one roll of paper, then you have got to divide the roll of paper and give him just what he wants." The President of the United States under any act of Congress ought to be given general powers, and whatever power he uses——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This gives general power, and nothing else.

Mr. SMOOT. Affect all alike.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is nothing else except the very same thing you complain of. As soon as there is proposed the least possible relief from seizing every newspaper in the country, then you complain because the relief given does give the authority to the President or to this agency either. As you know, the President has to act through the Trade Commission, and not otherwise. It is merely designating some source by which they can seize those who are absolutely violating the provisions of the joint resolution, and no others, and order a fair price. There is nothing else to say about it.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator how will any manufacturer of paper in the United States know he is violating a law unless he knows beforehand what the law requires of him? There has got to be a price fixed, and that price apply to all alike.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There will be a price fixed, and there is one fixed by agreement with the very trust, and there is another, as far as roll print paper is concerned, that they will submit to what the Trade Commission says until the end of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. If that be the case, then there is no necessity whatever for this legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No matter if they do violate the contract, as they would do in 15 minutes if they had only $2,500 to pay to keep out of the penitentiary.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a $50,000 fine in the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator from Arizona is a just man and I know he does not want to cast reflections upon any man unjustly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not, and I will not, either.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question, Mr. President, but what the Federal Trade Commission took up this question of the price of print paper. They went into it, as they stated before our committee, most thoroughly, and it was agreed what the price of print paper should be. They called the print-paper manufacturers of the country or the representatives of the leading mills of the country before them and after an exhaustive conference it was agreed at that conference what the price of print paper should be. The print-paper manufacturers thought that that agreement was made in good faith with the Government of the United States and were perfectly willing to carry it out. The agreement had not been made very long before the Attorney General started suit against the very concerns that had made agreements with the Federal Trade Commission that print paper should be a certain price. Shortly after that agreement was made with a commission of the Government another department of our Government starts suits against them to declare them a trust and dissolve the association. Just as soon as that happened the manufacturers who had agreed upon the price of paper stated if the Government of the United States was going to start suit they might as well let them carry on the suit and there will be no further agreement as to the price of paper until the suit was decided.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator allow me. The Senator I take it is opposed to the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I am opposed to it in the form in which it is.

Mr. HARDWICK. So is the Senator from Georgia on principle, no matter what form it is put in. I think there was some agreement that it was not to be disposed of until to-morrow or not to be taken up even. Of course, it will not be disposed of to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not to be disposed of until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My intention was to put my explanation of the measure in the RECORD to-day and have the amendments printed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that after the statement was made by the Senator from Arizona there developed through his colleague [Mr. SMITH of Georgia] a question that seemed so vital to the resolution that it was worthy of consideration, and in order that it might be obviated, if it could be, we thought it was proper to call the attention of the Senator having the measure in charge to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to discuss the measure at some length, but I do not care to do it until the amendments which the Senator from Arizona has offered have been printed and I can comprehend exactly what they mean. I think it would be better to lay aside the joint resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, I am through with what I had to say.

Mr. HARDWICK. I was not complaining of the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that. I opened my statement with the remark that to-morrow I shall more than likely discuss the joint resolution in detail, but I did feel like calling the attention of the Senator having it in charge to this one question, that it seemed to me was so vital that the measure would be unworkable and would be of no effect whatever if passed in the shape it is.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There are amendments to meet all those bad conditions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to submit two proposed amendments and have them printed in the joint resolution as it will appear pending to-morrow. I move to strike out "seventy-five," before "per centum," in line 13, page 2, and insert "ninety," and in lines 16 and 17, to strike out "seventy-five," before "per centum," and to substitute "ninety." I hope the Senator from Arizona will look into that matter very carefully and see if 10 per cent in place of 25 per cent would not be a sufficient amount.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I shall be very glad to give it consideration in committee, if I can get a chance.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the joint resolution passes, as it is likely it will in some form, I should like very much indeed to have those amendments agreed to, and I hope the Senator will find it in his heart to agree to them.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I would not want to meet the suggestion of the Senator without some sort of a showing of good faith.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I wish to ask the Senator one further question as a preliminary. There may be some bad men engaged in the news-print paper business, as there are bad men engaged in every other activity of human endeavor. Does the Senator find in any similar cases a penalty of three years in prison and $50,000 fine or both? Does not the Senator think that amount might well be reduced and not let it go to the world that these men are such a wicked lot of scoundrels that they ought to be dealt with differently from the rest of human kind?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no pride at all about that, and all those matters will rest in the judgment of the Senate. When we come to the final consideration of the measure all those things will appeal to me, no doubt, as they will to any Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will tender another amendment now. I move to strike out "$50,000," on page 3, line 24, and insert "$20,000." Let that be pending.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I suggest right in this connection, if the Senator will permit me, the national-defense act provides as follows—or any necessary supplies or equipment, as ordered by the Secretary of War, or who shall refuse to furnish such arms, ammunitions, or parts of ammunition, or other supplies or equipment, at a reasonable price as determined by the Secretary of War, then, and in either such case, the President, through the head of any department of the Government, in addition to the present authorized methods of purchase or procurement herein provided for, is hereby authorized to take immediate possession of any such plant or plants, and, through the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, to manufacture therein in time of war, or when war shall be imminent, such product or material as may be required, and any individual, firm, company, association, or corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, or the responsible head or heads thereof, failing to comply with the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years and by a fine not exceeding $50,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, that deals with the life of the Nation. Men who obstruct the Government in its efforts to carry on this great war ought to be dealt with very severely, and I would not object to $500,000 instead of $50,000, but in this business transaction it seems to me it is an entirely different thing.

As the joint resolution is to go over until to-morrow, I will move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Before that is done I ask that the joint resolution be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is requested by the chairman of the committee having the joint resolution in charge that it be temporarily laid aside. Does the Chair hear any objection? The Chair hears none. The request of the Senator from Arizona is granted, and the joint resolution takes its regular course and remains as the order of business.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest that we have a short executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not object to that.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, who art in Heaven, let Thy spirit come mightily upon these, Thy servants, that with clear minds, strong hearts, and high resolves they may prosecute the work of the hour with courage, vigor, and efficiency, and thus make themselves worthy of the trust reposed in them. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3081. An act to extend the time for the completion of the municipal bridge, approaches, and extensions or additions thereto by the city of St. Louis within the States of Illinois and Missouri; and

S. 2812. An act to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood from listening to the reading of the Journal a sentence saying that Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin made a point of no quorum. If that is in the Journal I think it is incorrect, because I did not make that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to have a correction made.

The SPEAKER. It ought to be Mr. GILLETT instead of Mr. COOPER.

Mr. FOSTER. It ought to be Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania was the man.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I made the point of order, as the RECORD correctly has it.

The SPEAKER. It fixes GILLETT, then. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. It was the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] who made the last point of order.

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday unanimous consent was given that the House take a recess at 12.30 o'clock to-day to receive the Serbian commission. I ask unanimous consent that that time be changed until after the President finishes his address to-day, and that then the House stand in recess for 10 minutes for the purpose of receiving the Serbian commission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent, in view of the fact that the President notified us that he wanted to come over here at 12.30 o'clock, that this prior order, to take effect at 12.30 for 30 minutes to hear the Serbian commission, be changed so as the Serbian commission shall come in just after the President leaves, and a recess of 10 minutes instead of 30 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is the first notification we have had that the President is coming up. May I inquire why this sudden change?

The SPEAKER. The change was necessitated by the fact that the President suddenly notified us that he was coming over here at 12.30.

Mr. GILLETT. I will acquiesce then. I suppose the House has to adopt some resolution on the subject.

The SPEAKER. It is going to adopt it right now.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move immediate consideration and adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 32.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Repsentatives on Tuesday, the 8th day of January, 1918, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resoiution:

House concurrent resolution 32.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Tuesday, the 8th day of January, 1918, at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

RECESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 12.25.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 12.25. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 12.25 p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

At the expiration of the recess the House resumed its session and was called to order by the Speaker.

JOINT MEETING OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE.

At 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m. the Doorkeeper, Joseph J. Sinnott, announced the Vice President of the United States and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Members of the House rose.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice President and by their Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Chamber.

The Vice President took the chair at the right of the Speaker and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. On the part of the House the Chair appoints the following committee to wait on the President: Mr. FLOOD, Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. WEBB, Mr. POU, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, Mr. GILLETT, and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the part of the Senate the Chair appoints Senators MARTIN, STONE, SIMMONS, OVERMAN, GALLINGER, LODGE, and WARREN.

At 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. the President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House and stood at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the Sixty-fifth Congress, I present the President of the United States.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 765).

The PRESIDENT. Gentlemen of the Congress, once more, as repeatedly before, the spokesmen of the Central Empires have indicated their desire to discuss the objects of the war and the possible bases of a general peace. Parleys have been in progress at Brest-Litovsk between Russian representatives and representatives of the Central Powers, to which the attention of all the belligerents has been invited for the purpose of ascertaining whether it may be possible to extend these parleys into a general conference with regard to terms of peace and settlement. The Russian representatives presented not only a perfectly definite statement of the principles upon which they would be willing to conclude peace, but also an equally definite programme of the concrete application of those principles. The representatives of the Central Powers, on their part, presented an outline of settlement which, if much less definite, seemed susceptible of liberal interpretation until their specific programme of practical terms was added. That programme proposed no concessions at all either to the sovereignty of Russia or to the preferences of the populations with whose fortunes it dealt, but meant, in a word, that the Central Empires were to keep every foot of territory their armed forces had occupied,—every province, every city, every point of vantage,—as a permanent addition to their territories and their power. It is a reasonable conjecture that the general principles of settlement which they at first suggested originated with the more liberal statesmen of Germany and Austria, the men who have begun to feel the force of their own peoples' thought and purpose, while the concrete terms of actual settlement came from the military leaders who have no thought but to keep what they have got. The negotiations have been broken off. The Russian representatives were sincere and in earnest. They cannot entertain such proposals of conquest and domination.

The whole incident is full of significance. It is also full of perplexity. With whom are the Russian representatives dealing? For whom are the representatives of the Central Empires speaking? Are they speaking for the majorities of their respective parliaments or for the minority parties, that military and imperialistic minority which has so far dominated their whole policy and controlled the affairs of Turkey and of the Balkan states which have felt obliged to become their associates in the war? The Russian representatives have insisted, very justly, very wisely, and in the true spirit of modern democracy, that the conferences they have been holding with the Teutonic and Turkish statesmen should be held within open, not closed, doors, and all the world has been audience, as was desired. To whom have we been listening, then? To those who speak the spirit and intention of the Resolutions of the German Reichstag of the ninth of July last, the spirit and intention of the liberal leaders and parties of Germany, or to those who resist and defy that spirit and intention and insist upon conquest and subjugation? Or are we listening, in fact, to both, unreconciled and in open and hopeless contradiction? These are very serious and pregnant questions. Upon the answer to them depends the peace of the world.

But, whatever the results of the parleys at Brest-Litovsk, whatever the confusions of counsel and of purpose in the utterances of the spokesmen of the Central Empires, they have again attempted to acquaint the world with their objects in the war and have again challenged their adversaries to say what their objects are and what sort of settlement they would deem just and satisfactory. There is no good reason why that challenge should not be responded to, and responded to with the utmost candor. We did not wait for it. Not once, but again and again, we have laid our whole thought and purpose before the world, not in general terms only, but each time with sufficient definition to make it clear what sort of definitive terms of settlement must necessarily spring out of them. Within the last week Mr. Lloyd George has spoken with admirable candor and in admirable spirit for the people and Government of Great Britain. [Applause.] There is no confusion of counsel among the adversaries of the Central Powers, no uncertainty of principle, no vagueness of detail. The only secrecy of counsel, the only lack of fearless frankness, the only failure to make definite statement of the objects of the war, lies with Germany and her Allies. The issues of life and death hang upon these definitions. No statesman who has the least conception of his responsibility ought for a moment to permit himself to continue this tragical and appalling outpouring of blood and treasure unless he is sure beyond a peradventure that the objects of the vital sacrifice are part and parcel of the very life of Society [applause], and that the people for whom he speaks think them right and imperative as he does.

There is, moreover, a voice calling for these definitions of principle and of purpose which is, it seems to me, more thrilling and more compelling than any of the many moving voices with which the troubled air of the world is filled. It is the voice of the Russian people. [Applause.] They are prostrate and all but helpless, it would seem, before the grim power of Germany, which has hitherto known no relenting and no pity. Their power, apparently, is shattered. And yet their soul is not subservient. They will not yield either in principle or in action. Their conception of what is right, of what it is humane and honorable for them to accept, has been stated with a frankness, a largeness of view, a generosity of spirit, and a universal human sympathy which must challenge the admiration of every friend of mankind [applause]; and they have refused to compound their ideals or desert others that they themselves may be safe.

They call to us to say what it is that we desire, in what, if in anything, our purpose and our spirit differ from theirs; and I believe that the people of the United States would wish me to respond, with utter simplicity and frankness. Whether their present leaders believe it or not, it is our heartfelt desire and hope that some way may be opened whereby we may be privileged to assist the people of Russia to attain their utmost hope of liberty and ordered peace. [Applause.]

It will be our wish and purpose that the processes of peace, when they are begun, shall be absolutely open and that they shall involve and permit henceforth no secret understandings of any kind. [Applause.] The day of conquest and aggrandizement is gone by; so is also the day of secret covenants entered into in the interest of particular governments and likely at some unlooked-for moment to upset the peace of the world. It is this happy fact, now clear to the view of every public man whose thoughts do not still linger in an age that is dead and gone, which makes it possible for every nation whose purposes are consistent with justice and the peace of the world to avow now or at any other time the objects it has in view.

We entered this war because violations of right had occurred which touched us to the quick and made the life of our own people impossible unless they were corrected and the world secured once for all against their recurrence. What we demand in this war, therefore, is nothing peculiar to ourselves. It is that the world be made fit and safe to live in; and particularly that it be made safe for every peace-loving nation which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression. All the peoples of the world are in effect partners in this interest, and for our own part we see very clearly that unless justice be done to others it will not be done to us. The programme of the world's peace, therefore, is our programme; and that programme, the only possible programme, as we see it, is this:

I. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view. [Applause.]

II. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war [applause], except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

III. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance. [Applause.]

IV. Adequate guarantees given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety. [Applause.]

V. A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined. [Applause.]

VI. The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy [applause] and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. [Applause.] The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

VII. Belgium, the whole world will agree, must be evacuated and restored [applause], without any attempt to limit the sovereignty which she enjoys in common with all other free nations. No other single act will serve as this will serve to restore confidence among the nations in the laws which they have themselves set and determined for the government of their relations with one another. Without this healing act the whole structure and validity of international law is forever impaired.

VIII. All French territory should be freed and the invaded portions restored, and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine [applause], which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly fifty years, should be righted, in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all. [Prolonged applause.]

IX. A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality. [Applause.]

X. The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development. [Applause.]

XI. Rumania, Serbia, and Montenegro should be evacuated; occupied territories restored; Serbia accorded free and secure access to the sea [applause]; and the relations of the several Balkan states to one another determined by friendly counsel along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality; and international guarantees of the political and economic independence and territorial integrity of the several Balkan states should be entered into. [Applause.]

XII. The Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, but the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development [applause], and the Dardanelles should be permanently opened as a free passage to the ships and commerce of all nations under international guarantees. [Applause.]

XIII. An independent Polish state should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea, and whose political and economic independence and territorial integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant. [Applause.]

XIV. A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small states alike. [Applause.]

In regard to these essential rectifications of wrong and assertions of right we feel ourselves to be intimate partners of all the governments and peoples associated together against the Imperialists. We cannot be separated in interest or divided in purpose. We stand together until the end. [Applause.]

For such arrangements and covenants we are willing to fight and to continue to fight until they are achieved; but only because we wish the right to prevail and desire a just and stable peace such as can be secured only by removing the chief provocations to war, which this programme does remove. We have no jealousy of German greatness, and there is nothing in this programme that impairs it. We grudge her no achievement or distinction of learning or of pacific enterprise such as have made her record very bright and very enviable. We do not wish to injure her or to block in any way her legitimate influence or power. We do not wish to fight her either with arms or with hostile arrangements of trade if she is willing to associate herself with us and the other peace-loving nations of the world in covenants of justice and law and fair dealing. We wish her only to accept a place of equality among the peoples of the world,—the new world in which we now live,—instead of a place of mastery. [Applause.]

Neither do we presume to suggest to her any alteration or modification of her institutions. But it is necessary, we must frankly say, and necessary as a preliminary to any intelligent dealings with her on our part, that we should know whom her spokesmen speak for when they speak to us [applause], whether for the Reichstag majority or for the military party and the men whose creed is imperial domination.

We have spoken now, surely, in terms too concrete to admit of any further doubt or question. An evident principle runs through the whole programme I have outlined. It is the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities, and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be strong or weak. Unless this principle be made its foundation no part of the structure of international justice can stand. The people of the United States could act upon no other principle; and to the vindication of this principle they are ready to devote their lives, their honor, and everything that they possess. The moral climax of this the culminating and final war for human liberty has come, and they are ready to put their own strength, their own highest purpose, their own integrity and devotion to the test. [Prolonged applause.]

At 12 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m. the President retired from the Hall of the House.

At 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m the Speaker announced that the joint session had dissolved.

Thereupon the Vice President and Members of the Senate returned to their Chamber.

SERBIAN MISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as a committee to escort the Serbian mission Messrs. FLOOD, DENT, SABATH, COOPER of Wisconsin, and FORDNEY, and the House will stand in recess.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

At 1 o'clock p. m. the members of the Serbian mission, escorted by the committee appointed by the Speaker, entered the Hall of the House and were announced by the Doorkeeper. The members of the mission were: Dr. Milenko R. Vesnitch (chairman), Dr. Sima Lozanitch, Gen. Michailo Rachitch, Lieut. Col. Michailo Nenadovitch, Capt. Milan Yovitchitch, and Mr. Vladislav Martinatz.

Mr. Lioubomir Michailovitch, minister from Serbia to the United States, accompanied the mission into the Hall of the House, together with the Third Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Breckinridge Long; A. B. Ruddock, of the Department of State; and Lieut. H. F. Armstrong, United States Army.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, almost 500 years ago the Turks overran the Balkans and got as far as the capital of Austria, and John Sobieski, the heroic King of Poland, went down there with an army and defeated the Turks under the walls of Vienna. From that day to this the Turks have been retreating eastward, sometimes very slowly and sometimes more rapidly. During all these years, nearly five centuries, the Serbians and Montenegrins have kept up a more or less constant warfare against the Turks. [Applause.] They never admitted that they were conquered. Serbia was one of the first of the Balkan Provinces that achieved its independence. It is one of the smaller States of Europe, but no nation in the world has ever put up a braver fight. [Applause.] About the time that the western end of the Balkans, including Serbia, had achieved independence from the Turks, the Austrians precipitated this war by an assault on Serbia. They did not get along as easily as they supposed they would, and the Serbians fought them inch by inch, and were driven from their own country only by the overwhelming force of men and guns. I suppose that in this war the Serbians have suffered more than any other nation in Europe.

I take pleasure in introducing to the House the head of the Serbian mission to the United States, Dr. Milenko R. Vesnitch, who will now address the House. [Applause.]

Dr. VESNITCH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, we stand here, in this post of honor, my friends and myself, thanks to your great courtesy, and my first thoughts go beyond you to your constituents, to those whom you so conscientiously represent, and who probably have often asked of you the reason for this catastrophe overwhelming the world, and which has imposed upon them the greatest sacrifices which humanity has ever been called upon to endure. Would that my voice might reach them all, but, alas! I fear that I can not hope to succeed in this self-imposed task, for the voice of a modest representative of a small nation is too weak to be heard throughout this vast country. Nevertheless, I dare not hesitate, and your democracy, gracious and gentle as it is powerful, will lend its ears to my voice, because I ask the favor of speaking the truth and of invoking justice for the cause of the allies and for that of my desolate country.

The most distinguished of our common allies have explained to you from this platform the reasons for which Germany and Austria-Hungary have provoked this tremendous war, and for which all righteous and liberty-loving nations have been successively and necessarily involved in this conflagration. This duty was for none of them so great and so imperative as for me; for little Serbia, as you know, was the first nation attacked by Austria-Hungary, and later invaded by Germany, Bulgaria, and Turkey. Serbia was the first object of the Teuton's aggression. In a single moment the armies of four powers, representing 150,000,000 inhabitants, were hurled against a small nation of hardly 5,000,000, whose army was exhausted by two preceding wars.

Why did the central European powers attack us, aided by their Turanian, Asiatic, and half-Asiatic allies? Why did the liberal nations of Europe interfere in this unequal struggle? Why was it impossible for your great country to stand, as it were, apart, and await the final result of this immense conflict, far from the field of battle? To frame clearly the answer of these questions would require hours and hours, if not days, and, as I may not impose upon your good nature or claim more than half an hour of your precious time, I shall endeavor to be very brief. Because of this my address will necessarily suffer, but I count upon your indulgence.

You will, I sincerely hope, agree with me that a great and enlightened democracy has the right in our time to be fully informed why it is that its citizens, so far removed from the battle field, why, to be specific, the countrymen of Washington and Monroe, should forsake their regular occupations, renounce all their cherished plans, and concentrate their thoughts and their powers, physical as well as moral and material, exclusively on one object—to win the war. The necessity for this is absolute.

Two motives have led Germany and Austria-Hungary to crush Serbia, both of which were peremptory and categorical. The first was dictated by the determination of the Germans to become the masters of the world after having successfully subjected Europe to their will and having settled themselves in Asia Minor. The second was due to the horror in which the German mind holds democracy. If you consider these two motives more closely you will readily persuade yourselves that their origin is the same autocratic mentality of the Teutons, of which the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs are the strongest and the most evident personifications. This mentality manifested itself long ago in the Middle Ages, when the Hohenzollerns imposed Christianity with the sword for political purposes, and when the Hapsburgs forced a people to stand bareheaded before the hat of Gessler. Medieval, feudal robbers, the Hohenzollerns descended from their mountain castles, and, passing through the county of Nuremburg, founded the Duchy of Brandenburg, outraging and exterminating the Slavs, and colonizing their lands with Teutons. Through persistent intrigue and military activity they have transformed their dominions into the Kingdom of Prussia, which they enlarged by robbing Austria of Silesia, Denmark of Schleswig-Holstein, and, excluding Austria from the circle of German States, formed the North German Confederation, under the leadership of Prussia. Five years later the South German States, through compulsion and compromise, were united with the North German States and merged into an empire, and, enlarged by the cynical annexation of Alsace and Lorraine, under the dominion of this same Prussia, the German States have become Prussianized. From that moment the ambition of the Hohenzollerns has known no bounds. They have resolved to conquer the world. Indeed, before Nietsche announced his theory of the superman, the German people considered themselves to be a superior people. Their superior people—Ubervolk, to use their own expression—ought, in their opinion, to govern and direct the world, because, in their pride, they claimed to be the cultured people—in their own language Kulturvolk—and the transmitters of culture, as they termed it, Kulturtrager—to the peoples of the earth. The first step to be taken was to secure financial and agricultural resources for the struggle which this ambition would necessarily provoke. These, they early saw, were to be found in Palestine and Mesopotamia, where there were cotton and wheat in abundance. After having for scores of years lulled the Turks into a belief in their friendship, until the Kaiser, with turban on head, knelt before the grave of Mohammed, the Germans decided to cut their way through the Balkans. But to reach Constantinople and Saloniki it was necessary to win over or to crush Serbia. As we could not be won over, our destruction was quickly decided at Berlin and Vienna.

The House of Hapsburg had even more reasons to wish for our disappearance from the map. Old feudal brigands, descending from the Swiss mountains, the Hapsburgs conquered, often fraudently acquired, Province after Province. By cabal, corruption, and treachery, they acquired the crown of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, without ever seeing in their provinces and realms anything more than private lands or family domains. Even nowadays the Hapsburgs do not recognize an Austrian or Hungarian, a Czech or Croat country, nor even an Austria-Hungary. They only know lands and estates belonging to their house like simple property, and it is on the basis of these conceptions that they administer their Provinces, considering the inhabitants as belonging to and forming a part of their estates. At the same time, being essentially a Teutonic dynasty, the Hapsburgs have always been in the East the agents of German policy. With the exception of the German, and from the latter half of the last century Magyar, they have never tolerated national tendencies under their rule, and they have persecuted systematically every nation or race with those ambitions, especially the Slavs; but they have emptied the vials of their wrath upon the Yougoslavs, because the democratic Slovenes and Croats had seen in the Serbia of their brothers the realization of their dreams extending over centuries, and, as they have openly and with all their energy favored our development, many of them abandoning their homes and their native lands in order to pass over to and to settle in little Serbia, the feudal and bureaucratic Hapsburgs have seen in our country a real danger to their political situation. And because of this menace, as they considered it, they long ago inaugurated the policy of oppressing the Yougoslavs, of persecuting Serbia, and of thwarting all our endeavors toward a normal economic and political development.

If Austria-Hungary has become a hell to all her inhabitants, with the exception of the Germans and Magyars, no nationality has suffered more under Hapsburg misrule than the Yougoslavs.

Hatred of the Croats and of the Slovenes has increased in the last 50 years as they have begun to oppose Germanization, leaning upon Serbia as a defense and upon her democracy. Since the formation of the Austro-German alliance of 1879, Vienna and Berlin have been united in their policy to crush Serbia because of its democracy—a small America in the southeast of Europe—and to counteract every effort of the Serbs and Croats or Slovenes in the dual monarchy standing in their way.

Our desperate moral and political situation has been truly pictured by one of our great national poets, "Our tears flow unremarked, and neither our cries nor our prayers are heard." The ambition to dominate the world, and the determination to check democratic movements in their dominions, have been the motives which have caused the central powers to inaugurate this tremendous war. All else has been simple pretext.

You know the methods followed by the Germans in this war in Belgium, in France, in Italy, in Roumania, and even in Russia. You have never heard of the horrors endured by the Yougoslavs, not only in Serbia but even in the Provinces of Austria-Hungary. They are so cruel and inhuman that I am obliged to spare you the recital. But I must give you one, the slightest example of it.

Since we have been so happy as to enjoy the hospitality of your beautiful Capital, I have been going every Sunday to commune with your people in prayer for all the unfortunate men and women in the world and for our redemption from the evils imposed upon us all by German aggression. On every one of these occasions I have recalled to mind the military order issued by the invader of my martyred country:

Divine service is only to be permitted at the request of the inhabitants of the locality and only in the open air and outside the church. No sermon, however, will be permitted under any conditions whatsoever. A platoon, prepared to fire, will hold itself in readiness near the church during divine service.

In methods of barbarity, Austrians, Magyars, Bulgarians, and Germans have vied with one another. Contrary to the traditions of warfare in the last three centuries, and contrary to the obligations assumed in international treaties, the Austro-Germans, the Bulgarians, and the Turks have violated the most elementary civil, moral, and religious rights in Belgium, in France, in Italy, in Roumania, but surely nowhere in such large measure as in Serbia. Should they be victorious in this war, the turn of others would necessarily come, and neutral nations would not escape.

This situation imposes upon us all the imperative duty of facing sacrifices to win the war. I have come from the western front in Europe, and I saw there all the horrors of German devastation. Attila could go to the school of barbarism founded by the successors of Moltke. But I saw at the same time the resolution of all the allied soldiers, those under the command of your gallant Gen. Pershing included, to win this war, forced upon us all, and to restore right, justice, and liberty to the civilized world. [Applause.] But to win it we must act with all our coordinated energy and indefatigably day and night. We must not, we dare not, think of anything else these days than of the war and of winning it. Only when we hold complete and definite victory in our hands can we dare to think of peace. This peace must be a just and a lasting one, and to be such it can not be made in Germany. [Applause.] To obtain it we must realize that further great and earnest efforts are to be made. We must stand as one man and concentrate all our energies. We Serbs put all our confidence in our allies, as we have up to the present day, that this sunlight will dawn. We hope that the new world organization—for a new world will and must result from this war—will be inspired by the American spirit, tending toward "a more perfect union," providing at the same time that no State shall be deprived of its equality in the new society of nations. We may assure you, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, that in the coming happier organization we shall be factors and elements of order and of progress, and that we shall be happy and proud to stand beside you and to follow you in the way in which the spirit of Washington is to guide mankind. [Applause.]

The members of the mission then took their places on the right of the Speaker's rostum, and the Members of the House of Representatives were presented to them.

The distinguished visitors were then escorted from the Hall of the House.

The recess having expired, the House (at 1 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) resumed its session.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings which took place during the recess be published in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the proceedings incident to the visit of the Serbian mission be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DENTON was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Thomas J. Lamar (H. R. 19145, 64th Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

REFERENCE AND PRINTING OF THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the address of the President be printed and referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the copies of the President's address which will be printed and distributed through the Document Room under the rules of the House, I ask unanimous consent that 25,000 copies be printed and distributed through the Folding Room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that 25,000 copies of the President's address just delivered be printed in document form and distributed through the Folding Room. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the next to the last address of the President never has been referred. Does the gentleman wish to make some motion about it?

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought myself that being a special message it was unnecessary to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will refer it to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

HOUR OF MEETING THURSDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns Wednesday it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. on Thursday.

Mr. GILLETT. Is that with the understanding that the woman-suffrage amendment will be considered on Thursday?

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand the Rules Committee will bring in a rule on Thursday for the consideration of the woman-suffrage amendment, and that it is the purpose to close the matter up and vote on the amendment on that day, and we wish to have an extra hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Wednesday it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Thursday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], indefinitely, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] be given indefinite leave of absence on account of illness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

UNLAWFUL RESTRAINTS AND MONOPOLIES.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of S. J. Res. 106, extending until January 1, 1919, the effective date of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, now on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary clerk is momentarily absent, but the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has concluded his 30-minute speech.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to awaiting the return of the parliamentary clerk, but I want to be certain that we are not going to adjourn so as to cut off consideration of Senate joint resolution 106, because this is the last day of the existence of the law and it is necessary to consider it if possible to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. What does the resolution relate to?

Mr. CARLIN. It relates to the suspension of section 10 of the Clayton Antitrust Act.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there is some objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CARLIN. I am not concerned about the objection to the resolution, but I am concerned about its consideration to-day.

The SPEAKER. There is no trouble about that; it is entitled to be called up to-day. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], under the order of the House, is entitled to 30 minutes.

Mr. LONDON was called to the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, January 8 commemorates the brilliant victory of Gen. Jackson at New Orleans, but this year we Missourians celebrate it for another reason. It marks the date when the first petition was presented in Congress to confer statehood upon that great Commonwealth. The battle then begun was epoch-making in the history of our Republic. It ranged over the whole field of social, political, and constitutional problems, until it culminated in the famous "Missouri compromise," under which Missouri was admitted to the Union August 10, 1821.

It is the purpose of the people of our State to celebrate the centennial anniversary of the statehood of Missouri in some fitting manner in 1921. It is my purpose at this time to call attention to the rapid Americanization of Missouri during the first 14 years of its history and the tremendous effect of this change upon the destiny of the great West.

The transfer of Upper Louisiana from the control of France to that of the United States occurred at St. Louis March 10, 1804. The Province of Louisiana had belonged to Spain for 40 years, but Spanish rule had made little or no impression on it. The settlements remained French. Their language and customs were French. The spirit of the people was French, and no influx of Spanish colonists had come in all those 40 years to disturb the quiet, shut-in life of the little villages. The nominal transfer of the Province back to France to permit it to be ceded to the United States awakened in their hearts the fires of enthusiasm for the land of their fathers.

Gen. Chittenden thus describes the scene of the transfer:

> It was an unusual spectacle that took place in St. Louis March 9 and 10, 1804, and one filled with sadness to the old inhabitants, who were mostly of French descent. The formal transfer of Upper Louisiana from Spain to France had not been made when the time arrived for its transfer to the United States. In order that this transfer might be made from France to the United States according to the terms of the treaty with Napoleon, Capt. Amos Stoddard, of the United States Army, who had been delegated to receive the country from France, was empowered by the French Government to act as its agent in the transfer which must first take place from Spain to France. The ceremony of the first transfer occurred between the hours of 11 a. m. and noon, March 9, 1804. The Spanish flag was lowered and the standard of France was run up in its place. The people, although conscious that the sovereignty of France was being resumed but for a moment and simply as a necessary formality in the final transfer, nevertheless could not restrain their joy at seeing float over them once more the standard which even the 40 years of the mild sway of Spain had not estranged from their memories. So deep was the feeling that when the customary hour came for lowering the flag the people besought Capt. Stoddard that it might remain up all night. The request was granted and the flag of France floated for 24 hours over the city from which it was about to be withdrawn forever. At the appointed time on the following day, March 10, 1804, the ceremony of transfer from France to the United States was enacted. The flag of the French Republic was withdrawn and the Stars and Stripes waved for the first time in the future metropolis of the valley of the Mississippi. Thus St. Louis became perhaps the only city in history which has seen the flags of three nations float over it within the space of 24 hours. * * * (American Fur Trade, vol. 1, p. 105.)

With such a beginning, the task of governing and Americanizing our first-acquired territory was inaugurated. With this, our first venture in national expansion, the whole theory of our institutions was on trial. Was Missouri to remain French—a mere subject province, alien in thought and speech; another Alsace and Lorraine—or was it to become American, an integral part of the Union?

The first government of acquired territory is always military, but the military régime should last no longer than is necessary to establish public order. Capt. Amos Stoddard, afterwards major, the Army officer who received the territory on behalf of the United States, became the head of authority for the time being. He exercised power in pursuance of the act of Congress of October 31, 1803, which authorized the President to take possession of Louisiana, and which provided "that until the expiration of the present session of Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of said Territories be sooner made to Congress, all the military, civil and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion."

The settlements then existing in Upper Louisiana were Arkansas Post, New Madrid, Cape Girardeau, St. Genevieve, Carondelet, St. Louis, and St. Charles, and a few private trading posts among the Indians. The total population of these settlements, according to the census furnished by the United States consul at New Orleans, was 6,028. This may have included only the inhabitants of the villages. Many American settlers had come in during the last decade of Spanish rule, and these followed the frontier custom of building their log cabins in clearings on their individual tracts of land, often remote from the settlement. The French, on the contrary, clung to the villages. According to one estimate, about two-fifths of the inhabitants of the upper district were Americans at the time of the transfer.

On the 26th of March, a few days after the transfer, and during the same session of Congress as that which passed the act for the taking possession of Louisiana, an act was passed for the temporary government of the newly acquired domain. The portion south of the 33° of lattitude, and now constituting the State of Louisiana, was organized into the Territory of Orleans. The residue of the Province from the southern boundary of Arkansas to the British possessions was included in the unorganized District of Louisiana. By the act the latter was placed under the control of the governor and judges of Indiana Territory, which Territory, embracing Illinois, extended to the east bank of the Mississippi. To these officials was given not only executive and judicial but legislative authority, subject to the Constitution of the United States and to certain special provisions for religious liberty and for trial by jury in all criminal prosecutions and in civil cases when the amount involved was $100. All inhabitants between the ages of 18 and 45 were to be subject to militia duty. "The laws in force in the said District of Louisiana at the commencement of this act and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified, or repealed by the governor and judges of Indiana Territory."

Gen. William Henry Harrison, governor of Indiana Territory, thus became governor of the new District of Louisiana, which was simply added for the time being to his jurisdiction without being incorporated in the Territory of Indiana. Some technical question was afterwards raised about this on the subject of slavery. It was contended that as Indiana Territory was part of the Northwest Territory, in which by the ordinance of 1787 slavery and involuntary servitude were prohibited, the District of Louisiana came under the same law when it was added to the jurisdiction of the governor of Indiana Territory and therefore slavery became unlawful from that date. The contention was never seriously pressed. It is manifest from the terms of the act of Congress of March 26, 1804, that the laws then prevailing in the District of Louisiana were continued in force until changed by the governor and judges to whom the legislative authority was committed. As Gov. Harrison was not to assume his duties until October 1, 1804, he came to St. Louis, with his judges, in the meantime and familiarized himself, as far as possible, with the needs of the District.

The summer of 1804 was a busy one for St. Louis and for the new Territory. Lewis and Clark organized and started upon their expedition to the Pacific. Americans began to pour into the new land, led by the spirit of adventure and the unaccountable lure of a new country. After the return of Gov. Harrison and the judges to Vincennes from their visit to St. Louis, they enacted, on October 1, 1804, a few laws for the government of the District of Louisiana, including a slave code modeled upon that of Kentucky. Congress at the following session, March 3, 1805, changed the name of the District of Louisiana to the Territory of Louisiana. In response to a popular demand the act provided that a governor, a secretary, and three judges should be appointed who should reside in the Territory. The act was modeled after that for the government of Indiana Territory. All power, legislative, executive, and judicial, was vested in the governor and the three judges, who were appointees of the President. This is what is known in our law as a Territory of the first grade. It is a civil government and is one step higher than the military rule which it supersedes. It provides for local legislation but not for local participation in government.

The first governor appointed under the new act was Gen. James Wilkinson, who was then in command of the western posts of the American Army. The first judges of the Territory who served with Gov. Wilkinson were John B. C. Lucas, Return J. Meigs, jr., and Joseph Browne. The new governor established himself at St. Louis and took up his duties April 24, 1805. Shortly thereafter Aaron Burr came to St. Louis and visited Wilkinson, and the air was soon thick with rumors of the wonderful conspiracy of Burr to establish an independent empire in the Southwest. It was never known how deeply Wilkinson was involved in Burr's plans. After the acquittal of Burr, Wilkinson was tried as an accessory, but no case was proved against him. He was unpopular with the St. Louis people, whether on account of his supposed intrigue with Burr or because of his speculations in land is not clear. He was removed from the office of governor after less than two years' service. Col. Hammond was acting governor until the spring of 1807, when Capt. Meriwether Lewis was appointed governor.

The Americanization of the new Territory had now begun in earnest. In 1805 Lieut. Zebulon Pike was sent by Gov. Wilkinson to explore the upper waters of the Mississippi and to establish American authority there as against the encroachments of the British traders. The following year Pike was sent to the headwaters of the Arkansas, which resulted in his invading Spanish territory and being detained in honorable captivity. In 1806 the American post, Fort Bellefontaine, was established on the south bank of the Missouri River a few miles above its mouth. During that year and the next a colony of pioneers from Kentucky, under the leadership of Col. Benjamin Cooper, was established on Loutre Island in the Missouri River, opposite where the city of Hermann now stands. The return of Lewis and Clark, crowned with success in their efforts to reach the Pacific by way of the valley of the Missouri, gave new impetus to the fur trade. Companies were organized, and St. Louis became the emporium of this traffic.

The sons of Daniel Boone, Daniel M. and Nathan, had begun the manufacture of salt at a locality known as Boones Lick. This commodity was much in demand on account of the growing trade in peltries and the influx of the pioneer population with its live stock. The methods of the salt makers were primitive, consisting simply in the evaporation of the water from a salt "lick" or spring. The salt was loaded into dugout canoes and floated down the Missouri to St. Louis. Cedar Creek, which now divides the counties of Calloway and Boone, was the western boundary of the St. Charles district. The country above this stream was known as "Boones Lick country" and for a generation was the outpost of American settlement. Here in 1810 was removed the Cooper colony from Loutre Island, and the great fertility of the region attracted the first permanent group of American settlers.

The first newspaper in the Territory was the Missouri Gazette, established at St. Louis in 1808 by Joseph Charless. This paper is still in existence under the name of the St. Louis Republic. During the Spanish régime a few of the prominent French traders had established trading posts at points convenient for the traffic with certain tribes, but these were not even the nucleus of settlements. Manual Lisa had such a post near the Osage villages on the headwaters of the Osage River. Francis G. Chouteau founded what was known as the "Kansas Post," supposed to have been located on an island in the Missouri River about 3 miles below the mouth of the Kansas River.

The abuses of the unregulated trade with the Indians moved the American Government to do something in their behalf. The Spanish policy had been a restriction of trade into the hands of a few concessionaires of the Crown. With American sovereignty came the genius of the American institutions, which abolished monopoly and threw trade open to free competition. This was not an unmixed blessing to the Indians. Fraud, imposition, deceit, oppression, the debasing use of liquor, and the demoralizing influences of real or pretended sales on credit determined the Government to extend the "factory system" to the new country. A factory was a Government trading post, where the Indians could procure honest goods at just prices in exchange for their furs. The first, and for a time the only, factory west of the Mississippi was established at Fort Osage in 1808. The original orders from the Secretary of War directed the founding of a trading house and a military post to protect it at some point on the Osage River. After reviewing the situation, however, Gen. William Clark, Capt. Clemson, and Mr. Sibley decided upon locating the post on the Missouri River 4 miles above Fire Prairie Creek. This locality was 20 miles east of Kansas City. The post was accordingly started September 4, 1808, and completed December 2. It was first called Fort Clark, afterwards Fort Osage.

The lead mines of Missouri contributed also to the rapid settlement of the territory. The presence of a valuable deposit of mineral had been known since the time of the early French exploration. When first discovered it was supposed that the metal was silver, and this apparently fabulous wealth gave rise to the Mississippi scheme projected by John Law in 1719. The mines were worked in a desultory fashion under the French and Spanish, but no great progress was made. In 1797 a grant was made by the Spanish authorities to Moses Austin, afterwards celebrated as the pioneer colonizer of Texas. He was given a tract 1 league square for mining and smelting land. After the American occupation some real development occurred.

By 1809 a shot tower was in operation at Herculaneum, at which, tradition says, the shot was made to furnish the troops of Gen. Jackson in the Battle of New Orleans. John Bradbury, the English naturalist, gives an extended account of the lead mines as he saw them in 1810. He was impressed with the fact that there was a considerable body of lead under the soil of Missouri. The mineral land was held under French or Spanish grants and the proprietors did little besides collecting a royalty from prospectors. The latter went from tract to tract as prospects seemed to offer. They stripped the soil, finding the lead in pockets and selling it to the proprietors at a customary price.

The cause which contributed most to the rapid growth of Missouri was the fact that it was new slave territory. The Northwest Territory, embracing Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was free soil by the ordinance of 1787. The settlers from Virginia, the Carolinas, Kentucky, and Tennessee, who then constituted the most enterprising and adventurous class of the American population, crossed over the free soil of the Northwest Territory to reach Missouri, where they could take their slaves. This was supposed at the time to be an immense advantage to Missouri, and did contribute both to the rapidity of its settlement and to the character of its population, although the country never was adapted, from an economic standpoint, to the institution of slavery. The census of 1810 revealed a population in the Territory of 20,845, of which 3,011 were slaves. In St. Louis there were 5,667 inhabitants, of which 740 were slaves. The percentage of slaves in proportion to population continued to fall off with each census. After the coming of river transportation the doom of slavery as an economic institution was sealed. It was preserved only by the stress of partisan zeal.

Gen. Benjamin Howard was made governor of the Territory in 1810, and in the years of his administration several forts or stockades were erected by the settlers in the Boones Lick neighborhood for protection against the Indians. These forts had no regular garrison. In case of alarms the sounding of a horn summoned all the neighbors within the walls of the stockade, which was defended by the men and boys, all of whom were experts with the rifle. Punitive expeditions, composed of volunteer riflemen, were frequently sent after marauding parties of Indians who by a sudden raid had committed some outrage. Of the various tribes of Indians with whom these troubles occurred the Iowas only were of Sioux stock and belonged west of the Mississippi at the advent of the white men. They overran a portion of northern Missouri. The remaining tribes—the Miamis, Pottawatomies, Fox, Kickapoos, Delawares, and Shawnees—were Algonquin tribes, who had originally lived east of the river, some of them as far east as Pennsylvania. They had been driven from their homes by the steady advance of white settlement in the Northwest Territory. Many of them had fought in the French and Indian war against the Americans. By the time they reached Missouri they had become predatory vagabonds—cruel, bloodthirsty, and crafty. The savage virtues which they shared with the Algonquin race had disappeared in their contact with the whites and as result of their homeless wanderings. They gave more trouble than the resident tribes of the Sioux race that were found in the Missouri Valley.

The census of 1810 showed that the Territory had grown in population over 300 per cent in the six years following the change in sovereignty. All of the newcomers were Americans. It was but natural that they should begin to agitate for some form of political rights. Accordingly, a petition was presented to Congress in 1811 praying for local self-government. At this time the Territory of Orleans, comprising that part of the purchase below the thirty-third degree of latitude, was petitioning for statehood under the name of Louisiana. It was admitted as a State under that name April 8, 1812. The residents of the upper settlements, theretofore known as the Territory of Louisiana, promptly adopted the name "Missouri." Congress passed an act June 4, 1812, providing that the Territory of Louisiana should thereafter be called the "Territory of Missouri." No change in the boundaries was made. A governor and secretary were to be appointed by the President. The legislative power was to be vested in a general assembly consisting of the governor, a legislative council, and a house of representatives, with an absolute veto in the hands of the governor.

The house was to be composed of members elected every second year by the people of the Territory—one representative for every 500 white male inhabitants. The legislative council was to consist of nine members appointed by the President for five years from a list of 18 persons nominated by the house. The people were to elect one Delegate to Congress. The act took effect the first Monday in December of that year. Edward Hempstead was the first Delegate elected to Congress.

Here was the beginning of local government—an elective lower house, with an appointive upper house and executive. This is called a Territory of the second grade. The house of representatives held its first session on December 7, 1812, and nominated 18 persons, from whom the President was to select the legislative council. Gov. Howard had taken the field in the war then beginning with England, and Gen. William Clarke, the companion of Capt. Meriwether Lewis, was appointed governor. The first meeting of the fully organized general assembly occurred on the 3d day of June, 1813. A number of laws were passed for the local government of the Territory.

The second war with England, which was officially proclaimed June 19, 1912, did not disturb seriously the new Territory of Missouri. Actual hostilities did not extend that far west. It was feared by the inhabitants that the Indians, particularly those tribes which had come in from the Northwest, would be armed and instigated by British agents to commit fresh depredations. Fortunately, Gen. Clarke had, in May just preceding the outbreak of war, taken a party of chiefs of the Great and Little Osages, the Sac, the Renards or Foxes, the Delawares, and Shawnees to Washington on an embassy of friendship. As a result no organized warfare was attempted by the Indians, although the settlers did not escape occasional raids.

When the War of 1812 broke out Gen. Howard sent word to the settlers in the Boones Lick country to come into St. Louis for protection, but received this reply from Capt. Cooper:

We have maid our Hoams here & all we hav is here & it wud ruen us to Leave now. We be all good Americans, not a Tory or one of his Pups among us & we hav 2 hundred Men and Boys that will fight to the last, and we hav 100 Wimen & Girls that will tak their plares wh. makes a good force. So we can defend this Settlement, wh. with Gods Help we will do. So if we had a fiew baris of Powder and 2 hundred Lead is all we ask.

Whether the fear that British agents were inciting the Indians of the trans-Mississippi region to hostilities against the Americans was well founded or not, the rumors to that effect persisted among the fur traders. To prevent such influence among the Indians of the upper Missouri one of the most experienced fur traders, Manual Lisa, was appointed by Gov. Clarke subagent for those tribes. Lisa was the stormy petrel of St. Louis business life in those days. He was eminently successful as a trader and very tactful in his dealings with the Indians, but nothing he did escaped criticism from his commercial rivals. The Indians under his charge remained peaceful and even friendly to the Americans throughout the course of the war, but at its close it was necessary for him to resign and write a long letter to Gov. Clarke explaining that he had not enriched himself unlawfully out of the $500 which the Government allowed him for the expense of his office.

The United States Government, on the acquisition of the Territory, made Auguste Chouteau a colonel and ambassador to the Indians. Chouteau was a handsome man of winning manners and convincing oratory, with light hair, high forehead, and straight nose; was always smoothly shaven and carefully dressed. After the treaty of Ghent, which put upon the United States the duty of making peace with the Indian tribes, Col. Chouteau achieved his greatest feat of diplomacy in a council which he held with them at Portage des Sioux on the Missouri River, a few miles above St. Louis. As the result of the tact and fairness of Col. Chouteau, Gov. Clarke, Maj. Sibley, Manual Lisa, and other representatives of the Government in Indian affairs, the Indians of the new Territory remained friendly and tractable, and Missouri was spared most of the horrors of Indian massacres which have stained with blood the early history of many American Commonwealths.

The treaty of Ghent, which closed the second war with England, was signed by the commissioners of the two Governments December 24, 1814, but news of the treaty did not reach the United States until after the brilliant victory of Jackson at New Orleans January 8, 1815. An attempt was made on the part of the British negotiators of the treaty to settle the northern boundary of Louisiana Province, but nothing could be agreed on, and the treaty was therefore silent on that point.

The termination of the war, with the sense of security which that event gave to the western settlers from attacks from the British dominions on the north or from the Indians instigated by the British, conduced to the rapid settlement of Missouri Territory. The two Boones, sons of Daniel, surveyed and laid out the first road west of the river. Their highway led from St. Charles to Old Franklin, a distance of about 150 miles. It was a rude affair, consisting of little more than the "blaze" on the trees to indicate the route and primitive log ferryboats at those streams which were too large to be forded. Rude as it was, it turned the immigrant tide toward the interior of the Territory and became a great artery of travel. It was known as the Boones Lick Road, and is one of the famous highways of history.

Settlers poured in from the Southern and Southwestern States. Those who came brought their families, and, in many cases, their live stock and slaves with them. While they were accustomed to live as much by hunting as by tilling the soil, they were home makers and not moving trappers. They were of the best type of frontier life, hardy, adventurous, self-reliant, and resourceful. The axe and the rifle were their simple weapons to conquer the wilderness, and they were proficient in the use of each. Missouri was one great woodland and contained an abundance of sound, hard timber. Before provision was made for disposing of the public domain the new settlers squatted on the land wherever the fancy took them—usually on the bank of some creek, where there was water for the stock and the household. They did not gather into villages or even into clusters. Each settler maintained a jealous independence—"not near enough to hear the bark of his neighbor's dog."

Their houses were built of logs, notched at the end so that when the logs were laid one upon the other, the sides and ends alternating, they would fit together as snugly as possible. Chinks between the logs were filled with mud and broken stones. At first the logs were undressed, even the bark being left on, and the floor of the house was only the hard-packed dirt. Afterwards, as the pressure for immediate shelter was less acute, and especially as the family of boys grew, the houses were made of logs hewn square and neatly fitted together. Floors, tables, and benches were made of puncheon—that is, logs flattened on top and left rounded beneath. Chimneys were added, built of stone, running up the side of the house, with the fireplace opening into the living room through a hole left in the logs. Hardware there was none, so none was used in the building. No nails were needed, and the doors hung on leather or wooden hinges. A latch or bar which fitted into a rest fastened the door on the inside. This latch could be raised from the outside by means of a leather thong fastened to the latch and then passed through a hole in the door just above the latch. If the latchstring was hanging through the hole anyone outside the door could pull the latchstring and raise the latch. Unwelcome intrusion could be prevented by closing the door, fastening the latch, and pulling the string inside. "The latchstring hanging out" meant, therefore, the right to enter, or, colloquially, a standing invitation and welcome.

The woods abounded with game—turkey, deer, quail, grouse, rabbits, and squirrels. The streams were full of fish. The soil was fertile and the climate temperate. A little labor would raise more food than the family could consume, and there was no market for any surplus. After the few household utensils were provided, ammunition, salt, and some coarse cloth were the chief needs of the family. The men and boys dressed as much as possible in buckskin, so admirably suited to hard service and to protect the body in the tangled growth of the forests. Wild honey was a convenient substitute for sugar. Hunting bee trees was a sport of the late summer. A single hollow tree might yield several tubs of honey—enough for the winter supply of the family. Strange to say, bees are not naturally wild, nor are they native to Missouri. The Europeans brought the bees to our shores, but the insects escaped into the woods and became wild in the splendid luxuriance of field and forest. They crossed the continent in the vanguard of civilization, keeping just ahead or abreast of the settlers. The Indians came to regard bees as the forerunners of the white men.

The United States land system, so simple and so immensely superior to the Spanish system, was put into force in the new territory as rapidly as possible. It was not possible to begin the survey of the public lands immediately upon the acquisition of Louisiana. The country was wild and, for the most part, unexplored. The titles were clouded not only by the Indian right of occupancy but by the existence of the French and Spanish grants. The first settlers could only squat upon unoccupied lands and take chances on buying in the title when the lands were opened for settlement. The settler who had cleared the forest and built his improvements had no legal right of preemption, but his chances of perfecting his title as against a claim jumper or a mere speculator were greatly enhanced by a healthy public sentiment, aided by a firm reliance upon the "silent sentinel of the fireside," which hung above every chimney piece.

In 1815 the fifth principal meridian, the basis of land surveys in Missouri and Arkansas, was run north from the mouth of the Arkansas River. After the peace with Great Britain land was placed on sale at the St. Louis land office and at a land office opened at Franklin, in Howard County. Military bounties to the soldiers of the War of 1812, in lands to the north of the Missouri River, were decreed by Congress.

The act of Congress of 1812 creating the Territory of Missouri was amended April 29, 1816, by providing that both branches of the legislative council should be chosen by the people of the Territory. This raised Missouri to the status of a Territory of the third class, which is the most complete local self-government short of statehood. Little debate occurred in Congress over this change, and yet it was a momentous one for Missouri. It indicated very nearly complete Americanization of this alien land in the short space of 12 years. Nothing truly approaching self-government had existed there in the hundred years from its settlement to its purchase, but as soon as the American pioneer became affixed to the soil his political genius asserted itself. With both branches of the legislative council elected by the people came the opportunity for general legislation in response to local demands. The first Territorial legislature under the act of 1816 revolutionized the system of law which prevailed over all of the old Province north of the boundaries of the State of Louisiana. The Spanish law was found in force. It was swept aside and the English common law substituted for it. Not a vestige of the Spanish law now remains in all that vast domain.

At the time of the original settlement of the Province of Louisiana the French law, which would in any event have followed the settlers of that nation, was expressly introduced and the customs of Paris were given to the colonies as their legal code. This continued to be the rule of action in the rather infrequent cases in which appeal to its provisions was necessary until the cession of the Province from France to Spain in 1762. In fact, it continued longer, until the coming of Count O'Reilly as the representative of the new sovereign in 1769. The seven years from 1762, when French authority ceased, to 1769, when actual control was taken by Spain, is spoken of in our history as the "interregum." This means only that there were no legal governors, and not that there were no laws protecting private rights, for it is a principle of international jurisprudence that the laws governing the rights of private citizens are not destroyed by the mere fact of conquest or the transfer of sovereignty, but remain in force until altered or repealed by the new sovereign. This is what is known as the territorial theory of law which prevails among all civilized nations in contrast to the tribal theory of law which prevails among savage and barbarous tribes. It has been decided by the courts, both of Louisiana and Missouri, that the Spanish law was introduced into the Province of Louisiana by the Spanish authorities shortly after O'Reilly's proclamation in 1769—if not by the mere legal force of that instrument, at least by the practical adoption of it which followed.

Mr. Jefferson, indeed, insisted in the celebrated Batture case that this proclamation only changed the civil organization and the form of judicial proceedings, and that the French law still continued in force in reference to the civil rights of the inhabitants, but his opinion was not sanctioned by the courts. Notwithstanding this formal decision decreeing its death, the French law seems to have survived with remarkable vitality in the hearts of the people, as witness its reappearance more than 40 years later as the basis of the jurisprudence of the new State of Louisiana. In fact, the Supreme Court of the United States has said:

> Every country has a common law of usage and custom, both local and general, to which the people, especially those of a conquered or ceded one, cling with more tenacity than to their written laws, and all sovereigns respect them. The people of Kent contended with the Conquerer of England till he confirmed their local customs and tenure which continue to this day; and history affords no instance where the people have submitted to their abrogation without a struggle, as was the case in Louisiana when they found that the laws of France and the customs of Paris were about to be superseded by those of Spain.

Legally and technically, when we took over the Province it was under the laws of Spain, and these laws remained in force until expressly altered or repealed by the proper lawmaking authorities. The laws of the Province were never treated by the Supreme Court of the United States as foreign laws, to be decided as a question of fact, but the court held itself bound to notice them judicially, as much so as the laws of a State of the Union. After the American occupation, the earlier territorial acts necessarily repealed such of the Spanish laws as were inconsistent therewith, as for example the act of July 4, 1807, which abolished the Spanish law of community and gave a wife dower in lieu of her interest under the Spanish law.

But the act of 1816 adopting the common law, which was a complete system, had the effect of repealing the entire Spanish code and thereafter the latter had no existence in the Territory of Missouri.

The act adopting the common law follows in its wording that of Virginia, in providing: "That the common law of England and all acts of Parliament of a general nature, not local to that Kingdom as it existed prior to the fourth year of the reign of James the First, shall be the law of this Territory." The fourth year of the reign of James the First was 1606, one year before the first permanent settlement of Englishmen within the limits of the United States at Jamestown, in Virginia. Our common law, therefore, goes back to the time when there were no colonies and when neither the written nor the unwritten law had been warped by the struggle between the colonies and the mother country.

The common law of England was claimed by the American colonists as a heritage and followed them into all the territory belonging to the thirteen original States. But Missouri adopted the common law by the free act of its legislative assembly. Thus the common law was carried across the Mississippi and displaced an alien system that had held sway for more than a century. And Missouri, at this time, included all of the Louisiana Purchase except the State of Louisiana. Thus the destiny of the whole West was affected, and the seal of Americanization set for all time upon the acquired domain. It was the supreme test of the change of national sentiment. The body of customary law, the deepest rooted of human institutions, was superseded—utterly swept away—by the free vote of the first popular assembly, both branches of which were chosen by the people of the Territory.

In 12 short years Missouri had become American. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COX. I may have forgotten my history, but how long had it been French?

Mr. BORLAND. It was settled in 1700, and had been French for 100 years. In 1762 it was ceded to Spain, but Spain's rule was purely nominal. There were no Spanish colonists.

Mr. COX. Between 1762 and 1769 Spain acquired full power and dominion over it.

Mr. BORLAND. In 1762, and took possession in 1769.

Mr. COX. Did the French have possession again in 1769?

Mr. BORLAND. France acquired the Territory and relinquished it in 1803.

Mr. COX. So that France and Spain had the Territory between 1769 and 1802.

Mr. BORLAND. Spain had the Territory, but the laws and customs and inhabitants were French. We had acquired the domain by treaty with Napoleon, and the population was still so purely French that they demanded that the French flag be kept up for 24 hours. But it became rapidly Americanized. It did not remain long under military rule. Within a year it was a first-grade Territory, with local judges and local officers. In six years more it was a second-grade Territory, with a legislative assembly, the lower house of which was elected by the people and the upper house appointed by the President. In five years more both branches of the legislature were elected by the people. Missouri had advanced to a Territory of the third grade. The first act of the legislature, both branches being elected by the people of the Territory, was to repeal the entire body of the French and Spanish law and supplant it with the English law. No such complete Americanization of territory has ever occurred, and no such complete change in national sentiment in an acquired domain has been recorded in the pages of history. In less than 12 years a people, completely alien in thought, habits, and laws for 100 years and a land with an alien language, were Americanized and turned into American territory. In 1818, less than two years after that, Missouri felt able to ask for statehood. It was much more entitled to statehood at that time than any other State when it first applied. But on account of the bitter struggle between the North and the South then coming on, it was not until August 10, 1821, that Missouri was able to be admitted as a State. In 1821, under the celebrated compromise, Missouri, the first completely American State to be created out of an acquired domain, came under the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

UNLAWFUL RESTRAINT AND MONOPOLIES.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Chair lay before the House Senate joint resolution 106.

The SPEAKER laid before the House joint resolution (S. J. Res. 106) extending until January 1, 1919, the effective date of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the effective date on and after which the provisions of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, shall become and be effective is hereby deferred and extended to January 1, 1919: Provided, That said section shall become effective on January 8, 1918, as to any corporations hereafter organized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Section 10 of the Clayton Antitrust Act, which is sought to be still further deferred in its enforcement, was deferred for two years under the terms of the original enactment and was later extended for its operation, which limit expires to-day?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Its purpose was to prevent railroad directors from profiting by the purchase of supplies from some company in which they were largely interested?

Mr. CARLIN. That was one of the purposes of the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, there is a strong argument for this further extension, because the railroad companies are not able to purchase under contracts as limited by the provisions of section 10, which requires them as to all supplies above $50,000 to advertise for bids?

Mr. CARLIN. That is correct. The difficulty now is not how to buy but where to get supplies, and the request came to the Committee on the Judiciary from the joint legislative committee of the Senate and the House that has the subject under consideration. The gentleman will recall that a joint legislative committee was appointed from the two Commerce Committees of the Senate and the House. That joint committee wrote us a letter, which the gentleman will find in the report, suggesting the advisability of continuing this matter for a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a matter that the joint committee has under consideration?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; and they are ordered to report upon it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume by reason of the deferring of the enforcement of this section there is some valid reason why the railroads find it unworkable.

Mr. CARLIN. It is absolutely unworkable at this time and we have to get an extension.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CARLIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, House joint resolution 188, of similar tenor, was laid on the table.

RETIREMENT OF JOHN J. FITZGERALD (H. DOC. NO. 805).

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent. At the time of the passage of the deficiency bill just before the Christmas holidays some notable addresses, as I view them, anent the retirement of our distinguished former colleague, the gentleman from New York, Mr. Fitzgerald, were made in the House. I believe that those addresses, together with the address subsequently made by the former Speaker, Mr. CANNON, on the day prior to adjournment, when a gift was presented to Mr. Fitzgerald, should be printed as a House document, and I therefore make that request.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein the speech to which the President referred in his message this morning made by Mr. Lloyd-George.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the speech referred to by the President, made by the Premier of England, Mr. Lloyd-George. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the speeches made touching the retirement of Mr. Fitzgerald and the subsequent speech made by the former Speaker, Mr. CANNON, presenting him with a silver service, be printed as a House document. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a speech delivered by my colleague, Mr. HICKS, in New York City, on the subject of the European front.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a speech made by Mr. HICKS as to his experiences in Europe. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, where was the speech delivered?

Mr. SIEGEL. In New York City, on Sunday, December 23.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my request for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein the speech of Mr. Lloyd-George.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts printing in the RECORD the speech by Premier Lloyd-George?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman obtain an authorized copy of that speech, so that the speech that will be printed will be unquestionably the speech made by Mr. Lloyd-George?

Mr. TREADWAY. In reply to the gentleman I will say that I have asked for a copy and have been informed that undoubtedly an official copy can be obtained through the State Department. I shall make such a request of them in time to have it inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to prefer a request for unanimous consent, and if it be granted, then, at the conclusion of the remarks to be made, I shall move to adjourn. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] be permitted to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, on what subject?

Mr. BLANTON. I desire to explain my absence from the House at the time of the taking of the vote on the prohibition question. It is a personal matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted on Friday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, to address the House for three-quarters of an hour on the subject of an international league to secure peace.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] asks unanimous consent that on Friday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House for 45 minutes on the subject of creating an international league to secure peace, not to interfere with appropriation bills or conference reports. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I think intends to call up an omnibus pension bill on Friday next, and if the gentleman would provide that his speech shall be delivered after the passage of that bill I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from New York say?

Mr. LONDON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I make it after the consideration of the bill to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman changes his request until after the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] gets through with his omnibus pension bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend in the RECORD the remarks which I have just made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have been criticized—by one not in my district, however—for being absent on the 18th day of December when the vote on the prohibition amendment was taken. Shortly after the convening of the present session of this Congress, learning that there would be few matters considered before the holiday recess, I had agreed upon a pair with my colleague from Texas [Mr. GREGG] on the prohibition amendment. Later on he informed me that he was inclined to support the resolution, that he had about made up his mind to support it, and I released him from the agreement. On the 7th day of December Mr. T. A. CHANDLER, of Oklahoma, Mr. JAMES C. WILSON, of Texas—my colleague—and myself signed a written agreement to pair both on the national prohibition amendment and the woman-suffrage amendment, Mr. T. A. CHANDLER, of Oklahoma, and myself pairing in favor both of prohibition and suffrage, and Mr. JAMES C. WILSON, of Texas, against both measures, agreeing, however, that should all three of us be present whenever the vote was taken on either measure that then we should be released from the pair and all could vote. This signed written agreement was filed with the pair clerk on the 7th day of December, 1917, after which I left for Texas and Mr. CHANDLER left for Oklahoma, both Mr. CHANDLER and myself relying implicitly upon our pair duly executed and filed.

Having in my district 58 counties running 566 miles east and west, from Mineral Wells to El Paso, and several hundred miles north and south, from Lubbock to Rock Springs and Presidio, with over 400,000 people in it, and being the largest district in the United States, while over 90 per cent of the people are loyal, patriotic, dependable citizens standing solidly behind their flag, President, and Government, yet because of socialistic propaganda and ignorance of conditions, there existed some disloyal, seditious sentiment, three men having already been sent to the Federal penitentiary for such crime, and, moreover, many boys from my district stationed at Camp Bowie were dying, and some at Camp Travis were dying, I went to my district and drove in an automobile, through freezing weather part of the time, over 100 miles a day, making two, three, four, and even five speeches a day, and making a personal inspection of conditions at said camps, and upon one day especially I remember I drove 167 miles from Abilene, Tex., to Junction, speaking at Ballinger, Paint Rock, Eden, and Junction in behalf of our Government policies, no politics, however, being in any of my speeches. On the 15th day of December I received a telegram from Dr. A. J. Barton, president of the Antisaloon League of Texas, from Washington, indicating that the prohibition cause might be embarrassed by my pair with Mr. WILSON, and asking me to wire Mr. KITCHIN to change pair to some one else provided Mr. WILSON could be induced to vote for prohibition. I immediately wired Mr. KITCHIN on December 15 that provided Mr. WILSON of Texas would support the prohibition amendment, then to change my pair to benefit the prohibition cause.

Also, on December 15 I wired Dr. A. J. Barton that I had complied with his request and had wired Mr. KITCHIN, authorizing him to change pair if Mr. WILSON of Texas would vote for prohibition, and that if necessary to count Mr. WILSON'S vote for prohibition I would return immediately. On the 16th day of December, from Albany, I sent a telegram to Mr. WILSON of Texas, urging him as his colleague and particular friend since college days to support the prohibition amendment, thus permitting the States to pass upon the question once for all, and stated that if he would vote for prohibition to pair Mr. CHANDLER and myself with some other negative vote.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I have two minutes additional?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to speak for two minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. I received no reply from Mr. WILSON. Also, on December 16 I wired Mr. E. Y. WEBB, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that in case Mr. WILSON would vote for the prohibition amendment to pair Mr. CHANDLER and myself with some one else.

Also, on December 16 I wired Mr. GREGG, of Texas, and others, urging that they support the prohibition amendment.

I refer to pages 8683 and 8684 of the RECORD of last session for remarks I made on October 5, 1917, in favor of the passage of the national prohibition amendment and predicted that it would pass the House early in the December session. I missed only seven days' sessions of the House, as during my entire absence the House met only on the 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 17th, and 18th days of December.

I will state, on the prohibition question I am further already on record. On April 9 I introduced a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 40) proposing an amendment for national prohibition, which is practically the same resolution introduced by Senator SHEPPARD that passed this House on the 18th of December, and on the 19th of April I introduced a bill (H. R. 3565) to suspend the manufacture of and all traffic in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes during the war. On May 8 I introduced an amended bill (H. R. 4248) to suspend the manufacture of and all traffic in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes during the war, and on May 9 I got Senator KENYON to introduce a copy of this last amended bill in the Senate. These matters, I take it, place me upon record on this question as being unalterably in favor of national prohibition, and I ask unanimous consent that these documents may go into the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting these telegrams, and so forth. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman's statement is sufficiently clear as to what the telegrams contain, and I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withdraw his objection——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman objects, and it is not debatable.

SANITARY CONDITIONS IN DIFFERENT ARMY CAMPS, ETC. (H. DOC. NO. 806).

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of some Members of the House of Representatives I ask unanimous consent that the report of Surg. Gen. Gorgas on the sanitary conditions in the different Army camps and cantonments, as made to the Chief of Staff, be printed as a public document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] asks unanimous consent that the report of Gen. Gorgas, Surgeon General of the Army, on the sanitary conditions of the various camps be printed as a public document. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I assume the gentleman means as a House document?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 9, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of a provision of legislation to be included in some urgent deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 766); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Ordnance Department of the Army for the fiscal year 1918, on account of armament and fortifications (H. Doc. No. 767); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, January 9, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we address ourselves to our task day after day with the assurance that Thou art leading us on. When we stand for the sacredness of contracts we are sure that we stand with Thee, who hast entered into a covenant with men, and Thy word has never been broken. When we stand for the rights of men, the great and the small alike, we stand with Thee who hast made of one blood all men who dwell on all the face of the earth and hast fixed the bounds of their habitation. And when we stand for universal liberty we stand not only for the impulses of our own hearts but for that law which Thou hast written upon our hearts, the law of love and of justice and of right. So we bless God we stand with Thee in the great world conflict. Lead Thou us on. For Christ's sake. Amen.

COST OF OFFICERS' UNIFORMS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have a bill which I desire to introduce, and I want to take a moment or two of the time of the Senate to call attention to it in the hope that some action may be taken promptly by the Military Committee with reference to it if, after considering it, they think it advisable to do so.

As I understand it, the Government furnishes the uniforms for the private soldiers in our armies but that officers must furnish their own uniforms. Thousands of our young men have volunteered to enter the training camps to fit themselves for officers in the Army. They have done this from a purely patriotic motive, and this is about the situation which confronts them: While they are in the training camp the Government issues to them the uniforms that they use until their training experience is over. Then if they receive a commission in the Army they must go out and purchase their uniforms.

Now, what is the situation? The situation in this respect is just as it seems to be in almost every line of industry and every product of our country in which our people deal. These men must turn back to the Government the uniforms issued to them while in training. They must go to private establishments to get the uniforms they must have. The private dealer knows they must have them, and the result is that these patriotic boys must pay two or three prices for their uniforms. In other words, the profiteer of the country is given these men as his special prey, and he is taking advantage of the situation and making profit out of patriotism. I have here a letter from a gentleman from my State relating his experience, and I want to read it to the Senate.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. Why does the Senator limit his statement of this matter to those who have attended the training camps? The reason why I ask it is that I have received a number of communications from young men who have been made officers from the ranks, and in one instance a young man was inclined to refuse his commission because he ascertained that it would cost him so much to get the necessary equipment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. My bill is not limited to that, as far as the bill is concerned. It is true the slime of the profiteer touches everybody and touches all these various avenues of possible profit. This young man says in this letter:

> Last summer when we accepted our commissions a price list of outfit required was sent and we were given to understand that we could buy all of our quartermaster supplies from the Army quartermaster. When we get into the Army we find out that the quartermaster has nothing to sell, but instead issues an order that no quartermaster goods are to be sold to officers. This order was disastrous to us, as the Regular Army officers were all outfitted by the Government at cost, so that the only ones to suffer were the men who had given up everything to go into the fight.

My understanding is that he is mistaken in that. I understand that the Regular Army officers must buy their uniforms as well as other officers; but this is the result that came to this young man, and it is similar to that suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]:

> The result is that my outfit, instead of costing $300, as I expected and was willing to pay for, will now be $500. The most regrettable thing in connection with the whole business is that although the Army quartermaster can not get these supplies to sell to us at the manufacturer's cost every scoundrel in the country is stocked up with them, which they sell to us for two and three times their value. I can state conservatively with truth that up to the present time at least $3,000,000 have been taken out of the pockets of reserve officers in inflated profits for supplying them with necessities that the quartermaster should have supplied at cost.
> What is the result to those of us that are married and have families and must keep our homes running? Frankly, I can not afford to pay the exorbitant prices, and now down here at ———, with snow and freezing, I am wearing the same cotton uniform that I wore last summer. From the time I entered the Army I have drawn, besides my pay, $125 to meet my family's and my own expenses—

I have left out the name of the camp—

> Now, I am not complaining of the Army life. I am well satisfied, but I am simply up against it for an outfit. I have at least $200 more equipment to buy.
> If you can get the quartermaster of the Army to issue an order that all quartermaster supplies are to be sold to reserve officers at manufacturer's cost, it will be appreciated by thousands of officers that are in the same fix that I am. There is no question but that the wolves that are stocked up with military supplies will howl, but they should be interned with the Germans.

I think there is a good deal of merit in that last suggestion.

Mr. President, in talking with another Army officer he told me this—and I merely cite it as a simple illustration of what these men are subjected to. He said that while in the training camp shoes were issued to him at between two and three dollars a pair, and when he got out the same shoes cost him from six to eight to ten dollars a pair. Then for an overcoat that was issued at nine to fifteen dollars, that was turned back when he came out, he now has to pay from forty to seventy-five dollars. Then he showed me this—a little thing. He took off a belt he was wearing and he said, "When I was in the camp this belt would be issued to me at 9 cents, but when I buy it I have to pay 75 cents for it."

Mr. President, it seems to me that the Congress of the United States ought to do something to correct any situation like this. Certainly nothing can do more to dampen the patriotism of the men who have volunteered to fight their country's battles and who may be at the battle front of Europe fighting for world democracy while their comrades and the thousands who must come after them, if our declared aims are to be sustained, are being made the prey of profiteers at home. If we are to carry out the program laid down for us and we are to right the ancient wrongs of the peoples of the earth, rearrange the boundaries of States great and small, and set up and maintain individual sovereignties in Europe, we must do nothing to quench the patriotism of the thousands and millions that we will have to take from our homes to do this world-wide work. I hope the Military Committee will consider this proposition and act promptly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in reference to the remarks of the Senator from Washington I may be permitted to say that the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate is investigating the whole proposition as to the character of the uniforms being furnished to the officers in the three different armies and the character of the uniforms being furnished to the men and inquiring generally into the whole situation. We are now investigating this very subject, and the committee hopes in a short while to be able to make a report and give some suggestions. It takes a good while to discuss it, and I would prefer not to go into the question under this order; but, Mr. President, the committee is working night and day on this investigation and have been at it ever since Congress convened and I think will be able to present a report and suggest a remedy before we get through.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator if the report of the proceedings to which he has referred are being taken down and printed so that other Members of the Senate may have them?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are being taken down. There is possibly just a little of the hearings that ought not to be printed, but I will say that that particular portion refers more particularly to conditions in Europe.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to call out anything that the committee think ought not to be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There will be very little of it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to have a print of the hearings which are permitted to be made public. I have not been able to get them yet, and I do not know whether they are being printed or not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We are printing only a copy for each member of the committee at present. We are going over that after a little while, and I think that we shall not have to expunge any of it, and if we do eliminate any at all it will be simply a few pages of it that have reference only to conditions in Europe.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in corroboration of what has been said by the Senator from Washington, it is perhaps not out of place for me to refer to similar conditions existing in the capital city of my State.

During the examination of the Quartermaster General by the Military Affairs Committee he was asked by the chairman or some member of the committee whether Government contracts for clothing to private contractors of the same line of goods had not been, in some instances, postponed because of the additional profits that could be derived from dealing in those goods by the dealers. I think the answer of the Quartermaster General was that he was not informed of such conditions. About an hour after I had read this statement a major in the Army, who, of course, does not want his name given, informed me that every department store and every clothing store in the city of Denver had on hand a very large supply of officers' uniform goods and also a large supply of the ordinary khaki uniforms, and that officers who are volunteering, particularly at that recruiting station, Fort Logan, are obliged as soon as they are mustered into the service to appear in uniform and can only secure them from private dealers at a cost averaging from 45 to 100 per cent in excess of the Government's price for similar articles.

I visited casually three or four of these establishments and discovered as far as I could by casual inspection that this officer's statement was absolutely true.

About that time my youngest son volunteered and was accepted. I thought it was no more than proper that I should contribute a little something to his equipment, and I told him to go and provide himself with a uniform and have the bill sent to me. I got the bill this morning. It is from a private house in Denver, because he was unable to secure a single thing required from the stores at Fort Logan. The bill, without going into particulars, is $65.50, exclusive of shoes, for which I presume I shall receive some notification to-morrow.

Now, the condition of which the Senator from Washington complains exists everywhere, and it seems to confirm the impression embodied in the question asked the Quartermaster General, to wit, that the Government requirements are postponed for those of private dealers in order that the volunteer officers of the United States Army and the others may be compelled to pay tribute to profiteers of the country, because of their inability to secure this accouterment from the authorized official sources. I am glad to hear the chairman of the committee say that he is investigating these conditions. They certainly exist; and while I shall not anticipate what the report may be, I am prepared to go to any length that may be necessary to protect the volunteer officers of this country from this species of oppression and extortion.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I listened with interest to what the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] said in commenting on the bill he introduced with respect to Army uniforms, and I sympathize with what he said. I have no purpose of attempting now to add to what he so well said in support of the particular thing he has in mind to accomplish by his bill; but I wish at this juncture, which seems to be an opportune juncture, to make a suggestion of my own about uniforms, and I should like to have it written into the law, if there is to be a new law enacted on that subject.

Mr. President, I have read, all of us have, more or less, in the press, and have otherwise heard a good deal about the unauthorized and fraudulent use of uniforms worn by American soldiers in Europe. Last night at a social gathering—I hope I may properly speak of this—I listened to most interesting statements outlining in a conversational way the observations and experiences of two Senators who recently visited France. Among other things, I gathered from them is that our Army uniform has been frequently fraudulently worn in the streets of Paris and of other cities by men who have no right whatever to wear it. Of course, cases of this kind can now be taken in hand, as they have been, and I do not know that any additional legislation with respect to such cases is needed.

But beyond that I have something else in mind, Mr. President and Senators. There are to-day thousands of men in France and perhaps elsewhere wearing uniforms—officers' uniforms, as well as the uniforms of privates—who never get and never expect to get within the sound of a hostile gun. I believe that there ought to be some distinguishing mark on uniforms to separate the men who go into the trenches with their guns and put their lives at stake, from those who are holding other kinds of positions, no doubt of more or less importance—but clerical or civilian positions—positions that keep them out of the zone of danger, positions labeled "Safety first," or, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] suggests sotto voce, "bomb-proof" positions.

Mr. President, I know and you know that there has been a clamor for and a rush after the positions which are labeled "safety first."

Mr. SMOOT. And with a higher salary attached to them.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Utah observes—and I suppose he is accurate as to that, although I am not advised—that these "safety first" heroes actually receive, as a rule, higher compensation for their services than the men who bear the guns; and yet these carpet knights are wearing the same uniform and wearing the same marks upon their shoulders and upon their sleeves as real soldiers wear to show the rank which they hold in the fighting Army of the United States.

Mr. President, I do not believe that this is fair to the men who are to fight. They should not be thus put upon a par with the men who are to do a lesser, although important, service, but a service of little or no personal hazard. I do not see any reason why this latter class of men, generally speaking, should be clothed with uniforms at all, and still less why they should be given a military rank, requiring the fighting men to salute them. But if for some reason it is deemed necessary to clothe them in uniform, then I express the firm conviction that there ought to be some mark upon uniforms—maybe an entire difference in the color of them—but, whatever it may be, something to distinguish the soldier in uniform from the civilian in uniform; to distinguished the soldier who is in line of actual battle, or whose duty takes him into the zone of danger, from the man who is stationed so far back that he may never hear the sound of the big guns, much less the rattle of musketry.

I suggest this thought to my friend from Washington, since he is preparing a bill on the subject of uniforms, if it should happen to meet with his approbation, that something of the kind I indicate might be incorporated in his measure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I intended to ask that the bill which I introduced may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks. It is only six or seven lines in length, and, in brief, simply provides for the furnishing of these uniforms hereafter by the Government of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill introduced by the Senator from Washington will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 3433) requiring the Government to furnish uniforms to officers of the Army, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all uniforms, accouterments, and equipment required for any officer of the military forces of the United States shall be furnished and issued to such officers by the Government at cost price, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and the same shall be similar in quality and price for all officers of the same rank.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION RATIFICATION BY MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I was awakened at an early hour this morning from a deep dream of peace, superinduced probably by the remarkable message delivered to the Congress on yesterday by the Chief Executive, by a messenger who delivered to me the telegram which I send to the desk, and which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

JACKSON MISS., January 8, 1918.

Senator JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Prohibition amendment ratified on first legislative day of session. Vote in House 93 for and only 3 against. Vote in Senate 35 for and only 5 against. We believe Mississippi is the first State to ratify amendment. Great rejoicing in Mississippi.

H. V. WATKINS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the information contained in that telegram brings great joy to my heart, and bids me hope for better and cleaner things in our Government. It announces the flowering of the ideas entertained by me and the culmination of the great work to which I with other men and women have devoted many years of our lives in the State of Mississippi.

If I may be permitted a personal reference, I will say that the first vote I ever cast was against the open saloon in my State. It was a time when prohibition was unpopular, and the indulgence in intoxicating liquors was rather a common custom. The average toddy-drinking Democrat looked with suspicion upon any man who dared to antagonize the liquor interests. The saloon in those days was a potent factor in politics, and the person who undertook to interfere with the prosecution of that nefarious business was often denounced as a fanatic, a puritanical crank, and one who would put the shackles of intellectual servitude and the straight jacket of political proscription upon the free-born American citizen.

Prohibition was denounced as sumptuary legislation which, if carried to its logical conclusion, would finally eventuate in prescribing the form of dress and the regulation generally by the Government of one's private life. But "in spite of the stare of the wise and the world's derision" we continued the fight for this righteous cause, and it gathered strength as the years passed by until this good day when, thank God, we see the creed of the persecuted minority about to become the faith of an awakened nation.

It is gratifying to me that Mississippi should be the first State to ratify this amendment, but may I be permitted to add that this is not the first time that Mississippi has played the noble part of protagonist in great matters of reform. Mississippi was the first State of this Republic to recognize the right and capacity of woman to attend to her own business and manage her property interests. Mississippi was the first State, in fact, to emancipate woman commercially and place her on a dead level with man in the business world. It was also Mississippi's proud distinction to be the first State to establish and maintain by public taxation a great industrial college for the education of woman, whose curriculum and policies teach her to understand and equip her in all respects to enjoy the rights, privileges, and perform the duties of citizenship. And if I may be permitted to indulge in a little speculation, it is my deliberate judgment that Mississippi will be the first of the old rock-ribbed Democratic States of the South to give woman the ballot. That problem would have been solved many years ago by our people and justice done to woman if it had not been for the presence of the enormous negro population, which imposes upon us a problem of far-reaching and almost infinite moment. It touches every public question and involves limitations and proscriptions which overshadow every other consideration and fills the hearts of our people with apprehensions that often discourage enterprise and hinder progress and advancement along certain lines.

I believe the time has arrived when the influence of woman at the polls has become a positive necessity. We need the purity of her morals, her undeviating devotion to the home, together with her unfailing intuition which in the darkness always points the way when the logical processes of man fail us. If the women of the world had been consulted this world-wide cataclysm would never have occurred.

It was Mississippi, led by that incomparable statesman, patriot, and practical dreamer, James Z. George, who devised a constitutional scheme which mitigated the dangers and tantalizing difficulties growing out of that unfortunate enactment known as the fifteenth amendment. That amendment was conceived in hate and brought forth in a spasm of venom and revenge. Of course, the remedy which Mississippi's constitution provides, which saves us from Ethiopian incompetency in government, is only of temporary duration. This great race question still looms upon the horizon and as of old causes statesmen to pause and ponder; but in the Providence of God and by the ingenuity and patriotism of our people, I believe we will be able to meet and overcome all the difficulties that may grow out of it.

I believe the time has arrived in the history of this Republic when sectional animosity and war-generated hatreds of 50 years ago have passed away, and that the thoughtful, patriotic American people of the North recognize and appreciate the difficulties of their brethren of the Southern States and will at the proper time lend a helping hand in the solution of this great problem.

Mr. President, since the Nation is about to enter upon the herculean task of fixing the boundary lines of the nations of the earth and prescribing the form of government for the peoples of other lands, I thank God that we see the wisdom of devoting at least a little time to our own domestic needs; that we are providing means whereby the blood of our people shall be kept clean and pure, the mind alert and the brain freed from the fume clouds of intoxication. To do all of these things well America must first be true to herself. If America is to lead the world in politics, if she is to become the dictator and exemplar of civilization, it is important that we have a sober America. The saloon has been, and is to-day, a blot upon our civilization. It is a biting, blasting, curse without a mitigating incident—a cancerous growth upon the body politic which must be extirpated.

That the Legislature of Mississippi should be the first of all the States to act on this matter is very gratifying to me. I congratulate the Nation, I congratulate the Legislature of Mississippi, I rejoice with the people of Mississippi and throughout the entire Republic upon the action of the legislature in this behalf. May Mississippi's lead be followed with celerity by the other Commonwealths of the Nation.

NATIONAL BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. KENYON. I introduce a joint resolution, which I am going to ask to have read. I desire to say, in explanation, that I have tried for a good many sessions of Congress to secure some action on a plan providing a budget system for this Government. We are to spend, we are informed, some $21,000,000,000 this year. Outside of Turkey, we are the only civilized Nation—if Turkey can be called civilized—that does not have a budget system of finance, and it is time that we get out of the class of Turkey.

If this joint resolution does not receive the consideration of the committee to which it is sent, I propose within a short time to move the discharge of the committee from its further consideration and bring the question to the floor of the Senate, as no more important question can come before us now than to establish some kind of a budget system. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 121) creating a commission to report a plan for the adoption of a national budget system, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas in times of peace the expenditures of the Government were increasing yearly at a rapid rate; and
Whereas our entry into the world war will enlarge these expenditures to enormous proportions; and
Whereas the increased taxation to support the Government will place new burdens upon the shoulders of every citizen of the United States; and
Whereas this vast sum of money should be spent with the utmost efficiency and economy, and under modern methods of control; and
Whereas the estimates for the expenditures of the Government come to Congress without revision or scrutiny by any centralized agency of the Executive Government and are not treated by Congress as a part of its legislative program; and
Whereas under the present methods of legislative procedure the responsibility for the expenditures of the Government is scattered amongst a number of standing committees in the two Houses of Congress, which work independently of each other and of the Executive Government in providing funds; and
Whereas it is possible for private Members, on the floors of the two Houses, to offer amendments at will increasing the items of expenditures provided in the respective appropriation bills beyond the amounts requested by the Executive; and
Whereas under this procedure the evil practices, known as "logrolling" and "pork-barrel" methods, have grown up and flourished; and
Whereas under this system there is no possibility of a governmental business program, or of a financial policy, or of a coordination of expenditures with revenues; and
Whereas it is the consensus of opinion among men of business, publicists, and students of public finance that the adoption of the national budget system would put the finances of the Government upon a sound, efficient, and economical basis by making possible a business program prepared upon the responsibility of the Executive and presented by him to Congress to be enacted into law; and
Whereas the chief political parties of the country in their platforms in 1916 pledged themselves to carry out budgetary reforms for the Federal Government; and
Whereas it is the experience of practically all foreign governments that the national budget system is the only efficient method of dealing with the expenditures and revenues; and
Whereas to plan such a system for this Government requires careful study: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That a joint commission to report out a plan for adoption of a national budget system is hereby established. Its membership shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury and two other officials of the executive department of the Government to be appointed by the President, three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House to be appointed by the presiding officer of the House and Senate, respectively.

SEC. 2. That no compensation shall be paid to any member of said commission.

SEC. 3. That said commission is hereby empowered and directed to report by March 1, 1918 a plan for the adoption of a national budget system for the Government of the United States, and showing therein what changes, amendments, or adjustments the adoption of said budget system would cause in the rules of the Senate and the House in the laws now in operation relative to revenues and expenditures, in the organization of the Treasury Department, in the forms and method of preparation of the departmental estimates, in the method of presenting said estimates to the Congress, in the methods of accounting and audit, and such other and further information as said commission may see fit to lay before the Congress.

SEC. 4. That said commission is authorized to employ such experts and such clerical assistance as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this resolution.

SEC. 5. That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this resolution.

SEC. 6. That said commission shall expire on the 1st day of June, 1918.

Mr. KENYON. I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONSIDERATION OF TREATIES.

Mr. BORAH. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asks for the present consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 178) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and the same is hereby, directed to prepare a revision of the rules of the Senate relating to the consideration of treaties so as to provide that all treaties hereafter shall be considered in the open executive sessions of the Senate, and, when such revision is so prepared, to report the same to the Senate for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand, it is a resolution proposing an amendment of the rules.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is not proposing an amendment of the rules. It is a direction to the Committee on Rules to revise and report.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and under the rules the resolution will go over.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I do not wish to make an objection unless the request is for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator withdraws his objection.

Mr. BORAH. I simply desire to have this resolution passed. That will bring in the report of the committee, and then it will be up for consideration.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. Does the Senator's resolution go to the point of abolishing executive sessions?

Mr. BORAH. No; this resolution only deals with the consideration of treaties.

Mr. KENYON. I supposed, in view of the President's message yesterday, that executive sessions for the consideration of treaties would cease.

Mr. BORAH. This is in harmony with that suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, Mr. President; I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the consideration of the resolution, and it will go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish also to make the further point on the resolution that it is out of order. It is, in effect, an amendment of the rules of the Senate in that it directs the Committee on Rules to prepare a particular kind of a rule. I submit that such a procedure would violate the rules, because the rules require that notice shall be given of a purpose to offer an amendment to the rules, and then that the proposed amendment itself must be offered and sent to the committee. I submit to the Senator from Idaho that to instruct the committee by resolution to bring in a particular rule violates the provisions of the rule applicable to the way in which changes in the rules can be made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to debate the matter now, unless we are going to consider the resolution today. If the Senator objects to its consideration at this time I will discuss this feature of it on another day. I understand that the Senator objects.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I object and will insist that it has to go to the Committee on Rules when it comes before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to have it go to the Committee on Rules. That is my object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no objection to the resolution being referred to the Committee on Rules without adoption.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what I want. The resolution simply calls upon the committee to report a revision of the rules. Then, when the revision report comes in, it will be for the Senate to determine whether or not it will adopt the change proposed by the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that objection has been made to the consideration of the resolution and that under the rule it goes over.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not want the statement of the Senator from Georgia to go unchallenged that the Committee on Rules can not be instructed to bring in a change of the rules. We had that identical question up here in a resolution seeking to get rid of these secret sessions. That identical question was raised, and the Vice President ruled that it could be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not recall the ruling, but if the Vice President so ruled I disagree with him.

Mr. KENYON. That is unfortunate for the Vice President.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Vice President is wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has been unfortunate sometimes for presiding officers that the Senate disagreed with them or, rather, fortunate for the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has gone over under the rule.

THE DISTRICT CODE.

Mr. VARDAMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 179), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended to January 1, 1918, together with index and annotations, be printed as a Senate document.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR NEWLANDS.

Mr. PITTMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 177), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, late a Senator from the State of Nevada, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the morning business is closed and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

AMENDMENT OF THE FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT (S. DOC. NO. 160).

Mr. OWEN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3235) amending section 32, Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same.

ROBERT L. OWEN,
HENRY F. HOLLIS,
A. J. GRONNA,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

CARTER GLASS,
MICHAEL F. PHELAN,
EVERIS A. HAYES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. OWEN. In order that Senators may understand the conference report, I ask that the amendment of the House be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916, is hereby amended by adding at the end of section 32 the following:

"'The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized, in his discretion, upon the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board, from time to time during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1918, and June 30, 1919, respectively, to purchase at par and accrued interest, with any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, from any Federal land bank, farm-loan bonds issued by such bank.

"'Such purchases shall not exceed the sum of $100,000,000 in either of such fiscal years. Any Federal land bank may at any time repurchase at par and accrued interest for the purpose of redemption or resale any bonds so purchased from it and held in the Treasury.

"'The bonds of any Federal land bank so purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury, and held in the Treasury under the provisions of this amendment one year after the termination of the pending war, shall upon 30 days' notice from the Secretary of the Treasury be redeemed or repurchased by such bank at par and accrued interest.

"'The temporary organization of any Federal land bank as provided in section 4 of said Federal farm-loan act shall be continued so long as any farm-loan bonds purchased from it under the provisions of this amendment shall be held by the Treasury, and until the subscriptions to stock in such bank by national farm-loan associations shall equal the amount of stock held in such bank by the Government of the United States.'

"SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect upon its passage. The right to amend, alter, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he will not let the conference report go over until to-morrow and be printed?

Mr. OWEN. I should be pleased to have the report lie on the table. I move that the report lie on the table, to be printed, and I give notice that to-morrow I shall ask to have it taken up for consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. That is satisfactory, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That action will be taken.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, in order that Senators interested may understand the matter, I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if it is his intention to have this conference report taken up at the close of morning business to-morrow?

Mr. OWEN. I gave notice that I would bring it up at the first opportunity to-morrow.

Mr. HOLLIS. But would it be agreeable to the Senator to state that he would bring it up at the close of morning business to-morrow, in order that Senators may understand the matter?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I will give notice, Mr. President, that after the morning business to-morrow I shall ask that the report be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice will be entered.

SUPPLY OF PRINT PAPER.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 101, the unfinished business.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of paper at a fair price and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if considerations of personal friendship could control our actions as Members of this body, or if other personal considerations could rightfully influence them, I should hesitate to oppose the proposition reported to this body by my warm personal friend, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. But I take it that that Senator, as well as all other Senators, will understand that no such considerations can or ought to materially influence or control the position of any Member of this body with respect to public measures; and I am impelled to oppose this measure because it violates, and violates unnecessarily, the most important and the most fundamental principles.

What is this measure, Mr. President? It is a proposition that the Government shall go into the business of manufacturing and selling print paper. If the proposition were that the Government of the United States should manufacture the print paper that it needs for the Government Printing Office, for its own agencies, for its own business, it would be unobjectionable. But if the proposition is—as I think I can demonstrate to this body that it is—that the Government of the United States shall engage generally in the business of manufacturing and selling as well as fixing the price of wood pulp and print paper for a great business industry of the country, then undoubtedly Senators who feel as I do are bound to oppose the measure, unless it can be in some way justified as growing out of the present national emergency, in some way directly related to that emergency, in some way directly connected with that emergency.

The joint resolution is entitled:

Joint resolution to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of print paper at a fair price—

So far, so good—and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States.

Then the preamble recites as follows:

Whereas by reason of a state of war now existing it is essential to the national security and defense for the successful prosecution of the war to assure a supply of print paper and its equitable distribution at a fair price in order that the Government of the United States may be assured an adequate supply of paper products and that all proper news may be generally and efficiently disseminated—

All proper news may be generally and efficiently disseminated—

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That whenever during the continuance of the war and for six months thereafter the President shall deem it needful, he may direct the Federal Trade Commission to supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp and their products in the United States, and that such mills producing and such agencies distributing print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp and their products in the United States as the President shall designate shall be operated on Government account.

For the present I will stop there, because the measure explains itself, by its own terminology.

If it is justifiable at all, then we ought not to shift the responsibility for its enactment to the President. If a condition exists or is likely to exist which makes this legislation either necessary or justifiable, why should we shift the burden for its enactment to the already overburdened shoulders of the Chief Executive of the Republic? Has Congress sunk so low that it can not take even this responsibility in and of and by itself, but must ask that the President do this if he thinks it needful?

So I say, with all respect, that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Arizona, so far from improving the measure, makes it absolutely more objectionable, from my standpoint, at least.

Is it necessary, Mr. President, in order to provide for the national defense, that the Government of the United States shall go into the manufacture of print paper? If so, there is not an article in all the great commercial and industrial index of this country that can not with equal force—yea, in most instances, with greater force—be put in the same category by the use of the same argument. Surely we are not going to fight the Germans with paper bullets. Surely we are not going to send our overvalient and overzealous newspaper editors out to fight the Germans with their papers; although I will say that I would be somewhat reconciled to some of the things that have been done if we could take a few of these overly patriotic newspaper gentlemen and stick them on the front line of the firing ranks of the men they drafted. But surely we are not going to conquer the German Empire by putting the Government in the business of giving these people their print paper at a little lower price; and anybody who makes a contention so roundabout and remote almost makes himself ridiculous in the eyes of thinking men.

The joint resolution recites that—

It is essential to the national security and defense for the successful prosecution of the war to assure a supply of print paper and its equitable distribution at a fair price in order that the Government of the United States may be assured an adequate supply of paper products and that all proper news may be generally and efficiently disseminated.

My God! What a commentary upon a country in whose Constitution is embedded the guaranty of a free press!

Ah, gentlemen, if we could win this war in the newspapers we would have won it long ago. But the trouble is that some of our most valiant newspapers and some of our most notable newspaper victories do not contribute much toward real success. If we could capitalize some of their statements and turn them into an effective dynamic force, the Germans would undoubtedly surrender before sundown. But I am afraid that even though the American newspapers get print paper at the Government expense and by Government operation at a fair price the Germans will fight on just the same and that Germany will fail to surrender, although we, "for the national security and for the national defense" and in order to protect the country and in order to wage the war, have violated our fundamental principles and embarked the Government on the socialistic enterprise of supplying the raw material of a great business industry, all for the purpose of "the national safety and defense."

Mr. President, if this proposition rested frankly and solely on the real reason and the real ground upon which it must rest we would know better how to meet it and the country could better appreciate a verdict upon it. If this proposal be a part of the propaganda, somewhat general and entirely alarming, to substitute for private control, for competition, for individualism, Government monopoly, Government activity, and governmental participation in all the great businesses of this country, the debate could be narrowed and would be narrowed, for then the proponents of this measure would carry the simple burden of maintaining successfully to this body and to the country the proposition that our old-time methods of dealing with monopoly were obsolete; that our present situation is such that they are ineffectual. They could contend, as they doubtless would contend, that monopolies have grown up so strong and so powerful in this country that the courts were impotent when it came to their control; that even the lawmaking powers of the Nation are inadequate to give relief from their oppressions.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KING. What reason is there to differentiate this business from any other business? Obviously, in a Republic such as ours we must look with abhorrence upon a proposition that the Government should enter upon the domain of private business and private industry. Assuming that as a premise for the question, why should we then enter into the private control of this business? Why should the Government manufacture print paper any more than it should manufacture steel or manufacture anything else?

Mr. HARDWICK. Or grow cotton or raise wheat?

Mr. KING. Or grow cotton or raise wheat, as the Senator says, or enter into any other industry essential to the economic life and growth and development of the people?

Mr. HARDWICK. I can only answer the Senator according to my own opinion. There is no difference. Not only that, if this is to remain a free country, if the constitutional guarantees are to be preserved unimpaired, in their full vigor and vitality, there is abundant additional reason why we should not do it. You should never put any political administration in control of the great business end of the affairs of these trustees and servants of public opinion, denominated the press.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Following out the same line of inquiry of the Senator from Utah, I inquire from the Senator whether print paper, generally, would be valuable in the absence of printers' ink, type founders, and a printing press, and whether these would not be a necessary incident of print paper?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, undoubtedly, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If we permit a combination at this particular time and make it impossible to acquire any one of the things necessary to print, would the Government be justified if it allowed such a thing in an emergency like this?

Mr. SHERMAN. No more than assuming control of a potato patch. The householder has got to have potatoes, especially if he has a big family.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senators have gotten to the pith of the argument. If the Senator from Arizona can sustain this proposal at all before the Senate, it can be sustained with reference to almost every other line of business or industry and with reference to several other branches of the same industry, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois. Now, are the Senator from Arizona and those gentlemen who think with him prepared to accept the proposition that our statutes have broken down, that our courts have become impotent? There is a law against combinations, not only one law, but a mass of laws, from the Sherman antitrust law on down, including the very act establishing this self-same Federal Trade Commission. Are those laws impotent? Are they valueless? Are they to be thrown into the scrap heap? There are courts in this country presided over by able and distinguished, honest and impartial jurists. Are those courts impotent to give the relief provided by statute? In other words, has our system of individual enterprise broken down? Is that what the Senator means to assert when he presents this proposal? If he does, we must face it. We must face this question in a thousand ramifications. If he does, we must meet it on almost every corner and in every phase of American activity. If he does, then we need to reform a system, to change the form and possibly the substance of a government, because I am convinced, Mr. President, in all soberness and in all seriousness, that if this thing goes on unobstructed, unchallenged almost, we will have soon destroyed the great principles of individualism on which the rights and liberties and the very form and structure of this Government rests.

This is no war emergency. The same argument could be made with equal or with greater force as to almost every other article or commodity in the Republic. It is a sop to the press of this country, and that is what we know it to be. If in our effort or in our desire to give these newspaper people, by governmental activity, print paper at a cheaper price than they can secure it at present we are prepared to desert our principles and abandon all our beliefs, we had just as well realize at once what we are doing and what it means.

Mr. President, I address the Senate with a spirit of some sadness on this occasion and on this question, because I realize how futile are my words, because I realize that Senators who feel as I feel, who think as I think, and who believe as I believe are going to vote for just this sort of a proposition in spite of their thoughts and beliefs and principles. I may be powerless to stem this tide; I may be powerless to stop it; but, at least, I have the poor privilege and at least I have the high duty of standing here to protest against it. At least, I have the right to say to Senators, if you continue to do this thing, if you continue to yield to this sort of war-emergency measures, pitiful, indeed, will be the pittance of liberty and individual initiative that will be left to the once proud people whom you came here to represent, and whose liberties and rights you came here pledged to preserve.

I believe that I measure by words, Mr. President, that I would go as far as any Senator in this body on either side of the aisle to do anything that according to my opinion was best calculated and best suited to serve this country and advance its interests in the great contest on which it is embarked. I do not yield to any Senator in patriotism in that respect, or in any other. I may differ with many Senators about the wisest plan to pursue or the best method to adopt about many things; but, after all, can any Senator honestly think, fairly contend, really assert that this is a war measure or anything like one, and if it is not a war measure what Senator can justify it, what Senator can urge it, what Senator can ask the Senate to adopt so radical, so revolutionary, so unnecessary a departure from the principles of our Government?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARREN in the chair). The Senator from Illinois suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McCumber	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hardwick	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hollis	McNary	Smoot
Chamberlain	James	Martin	Sutherland
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Swanson

Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Tillman
Fernald	Kellogg	Ransdell	Townsend
Fletcher	Kendrick	Saulsbury	Underwood
France	Kenyon	Shafroth	Warren
Frelinghuysen	King	Sheppard	Weeks
Gallinger	Kirby	Sherman	Wolcott
Gronna	Lewis	Shields
Hale	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. KELLOGG. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. NELSON]. On account of illness in his family he is unable to be here to-day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent owing to illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I move to amend the joint resolution, as shown by the reprint in italics, at the top of page 2, and I ask that the lines struck through be eliminated from the joint resolution and that those which are printed in italics be substituted therefor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, let the amendment be reported from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, in section 1, page 2, line 1, after the first word "That," to strike out the words "the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered," and in lieu thereof to insert "whenever during the continuance of the war and for six months thereafter the President shall deem it needful, he may direct the Federal Trade Commission."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if this joint resolution is to become a law, I can not see that the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona would improve it in any way. The joint resolution as originally reported to the Senate reads as follows:

That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby authorized and empowered——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The joint resolution further reads:

To supervise, control, and regulate——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it continues:

To supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. President, we all know that if this joint resolution becomes a law the details of enforcing it will be administered by the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Unquestionably.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no necessity whatever, Mr. President, for changing the original language of the joint resolution in that respect and authorizing and giving the power to the President of the United States, if he deems it needful, to transfer it to the Federal Trade Commission, and then the Federal Trade Commission to put it into force. In fact, Mr. President, I think the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Arizona makes the joint resolution more objectionable than it was as originally reported.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, it is hard for me to conceive, when one understands the purpose of the joint resolution, that there should be an objection to the amendment. If the amendment is not adopted, the Senator from Utah will observe that every newspaper manufacturing plant in America would immediately be put under the supervision of the Federal Trade Commission. There is no necessity for any such broad, sweeping, and universal application of the rule——

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I will ask the Senator from Arizona why he reported the joint resolution at all?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Therefore we make the modification by simply inserting the words "whenever during the continuance of the war and for six months thereafter the President shall deem it needful," and so forth.

We know that information as to its needfulness will come from the Federal Trade Commission, who will have this law to administer, and this amendment will prevent the wholesale seizure of every newspaper manufacturing plant in the United States. That was the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Arizona for a question; but I want to say to the Senator that he himself reported the joint resolution just as he read it in the first place.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I did.

Mr. SMOOT. I know who prepared the joint resolution. The Federal Trade Commission prepared it. It went to the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses; and it was considered by that committee. I will frankly state that I was not present at the time the joint resolution was being considered. My duties called me to the Finance Committee of the Senate. The joint resolution was considered at a time when we had the revenue bill before the Finance Committee, and so I could not attend the meeting of the Committee on Printing. The joint resolution, however, came from that committee just as I read it, conferring the power upon the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. President, in the way in which this joint resolution is worded, if it should become a law, it would mean that there is given power to the President of the United States to withhold print paper from any newspaper or magazine in the country that he may see fit.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit an interruption, would it not also be true that the Federal Trade Commission could do the same thing under the provisions if it were unamended?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; but I want the Senator to understand that I think it is a most vicious measure.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I thought the Senator thought so.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it the most vicious measure that has ever been presented to this body, and I think, if Senators were present in the Chamber and would listen to the discussion of the joint resolution and analyze its provisions, the joint resolution could not pass the Senate of the United States.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. Without this joint resolution, could not the manufacturers, who have been shown to be in combination, withhold print paper from a newspaper at their option?

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President, if what the Senator from Arizona said yesterday be true, that there is an agreement now between the Federal Trade Commission and the print-paper manufacturers of the country as to the price of paper and as to its distribution, there is no necessity whatever for this legislation.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator just made the point, if I understood him correctly, that the Federal Trade Commission might withhold paper from a newspaper——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. Whereas, without this proposed law, that can be done by a private interest?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, it never has been done by a private interest. And not only that, but they could not do it; there are a thousand different places at which news-print paper can be purchased in the United States; a newspaper could purchase news-print paper through any one of the various agencies established for that purpose. It is impossible to control all of the agencies for print paper in the United States and prevent all of them from selling paper to any one newspaper, whereas, under the provisions of the joint resolution, all that it would be necessary to do would be to have an order issued that no print paper should be sold to a particular paper or magazine, and it would be absolutely impossible for such paper or magazine to buy a pound of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I should like to suggest to my colleague in answer to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, furthermore that if the Government takes control of the private business it becomes a gigantic monopoly, and it could withhold paper from any newspaper that it desired to punish, whereas if an individual engaged in the manufacture of print paper withheld the paper there would be opportunity for other individuals engaged in the business to produce paper and vend it, or private individuals of their own initiative could embark upon the business undertaking and produce sufficient to satisfy the needs of the public.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question, Mr. President, that the statement made by my colleague is correct.

But there is another provision in this measure that goes even further than that. It reads:

That the President, during the present war emergency—

And who knows what length of time that may be construed to mean; certainly, Mr. President, if there were any advantage to be gained it could be construed to mean until after the next presidential election—

That the President, during the present war emergency, shall have power by proclamation to declare that such imports of mechanical and chemical pulp and their products as he shall deem necessary in order to fully effectuate the objects of this act shall be made only on account of the United States of America, to or through the Federal Trade Commission.

In other words, we are about to pass legislation giving to the President of the United States power to prevent all importations of wood pulp or its products into the United States.

Why, Mr. President, we say we are fighting for the democracy of the world, but it is just such legislation as this that causes thinking men to conclude that we are fighting for socialism in its most rampant form. Why stop at the control and manufacture of print paper? Why not give the President of the United States power to control every business in the United States?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I wish to say that I regard the provision with reference to dealing with the Canadian situation as perhaps the most important feature of the joint resolution. The Senator, I believe, will bear me out in the statement, on the information which I have, to the effect that some 30 per cent of all our print paper comes from Canada.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Which is somewhere near 80 per cent of the Canadian output, and it comes into this country free of duty. Now, my understanding is that newspapers in Canada get their paper at about 2½ cents a pound, whereas, although it comes into the United States free of duty, we have to pay from 3 to 4 cents a pound for it, or something like that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; and if the Senator will permit me right there, I will say that these very gentlemen themselves are Americans running plants in Canada and selling to Canada at 2½ cents a pound and to our own people at 3 cents.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I think there is a good deal in that; but they are hampered by this condition as I understand: Some of our very largest manufacturers—I think the International Paper Co., for instance—have large areas of wood-pulp timber in Canada.

Mr. SMOOT. And so have other manufacturers.

Mr. FLETCHER. And they can not get it out of Canada as the Canadian Provinces prohibit the exportation of the wood after American manufacturers have gone there and invested hundreds of thousands of dollars in its purchase. After they have made their investment they can not use the wood because Canada will not allow the wood to be exported. To meet that kind of a situation, it seems to me we must have some such provision as this, so that we can say to Canada, "We will not allow that material to come into the United States unless we can come to some sort of terms and agree that we may have paper at the same rates that the Canadian people have it, a reasonable allowance being made for transportation, and that sort of thing." Canada has the advantage because there is wood-pulp timber there owned by American manufacturers which they can not get out after they have purchased it. I understand the Provinces, by some sort of regulation, prohibit the exportation of that timber and all the products of that timber. That was done, I presume, in pursuance of a policy to compel the location of manufacturing plants in Canada. That may be a very good policy for Canada, perhaps, but it does not help the situation in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator is through with his question I will proceed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am asking the Senator if he does not feel that there ought to be some sort of power vested here whereby we would be able to cope with that condition which confronts our manufacturers?

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the Senator I will state that the wording of this proposed amendment would not meet the situation complained of. The Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Utah live in a State that has no paper-manufacturing establishment nor within many hundreds of miles of them. But under this bill the President of the United States could close every paper-manufacturing concern in the State of Maine, or any one of them. Mr. President, wood pulp and mechanical wood pulp are absolutely necessary to the manufacture of print paper in the United States, and this provision means that an order could be issued against any one of the paper mills in Maine or in any other State of the Union in which a paper mill was located, preventing it from getting wood pulp or mechanical wood pulp from Canada, and this would result in absolutely closing the mills. We can not manufacture the paper that we do in this country unless we get the wood pulp and mechanical wood pulp from Canada, as everybody knows.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt there, this does not prevent the importation of wood pulp. It gives the President power to order its importation for account of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, that is what I said.

Mr. FLETCHER. But that is a power which needs to be exercised only where advantage is being taken of manufacturers in this country, and to prevent that. So long as wood pulp can come to the manufacturers here from Canada on the same basis that it is sold in Canada, or approaching that basis, there will be no need for excluding it.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is all that is necessary by way of legislation, let us pass a resolution to that effect, and then quit.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let us do anything except pass the pending joint resolution, according to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will please desist until I get through, and then answer me, I shall be very much obliged, unless he asks me to yield, and then I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator, then, will yield, so that I can respond to that politeness, I will say that when the Senator gets the floor he is almost as much of a monopolist as these news-print-paper manufacturers are. It is impossible for any man to interrupt him, no matter how gently he tries, without receiving some sort of criticism from my friend from Utah, for whom, personally, I have as high regard as for any man in the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should be glad if occasionally the Senator would abate his intensity enough to permit me to interrupt him, either to get, or in the wild hope of giving, a little information as the debate runs on. I certainly shall not intentionally interfere with or attempt in any way to weaken the force of his argument. It is not necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona occupied the floor yesterday for an hour and a half or two hours. Nobody interrupted him to any extent, and if he will take the RECORD to-morrow morning and examine it I think it will be found that the interruptions of the Senator occupy about as much space as the remarks of those that have addressed the Senate. Now, I am not objecting to that. Certainly the Senator from Arizona does not have a higher regard for the Senator from Utah than the Senator from Utah has for the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. President, what is back of this legislation? Who is pushing it? Why is it wanted? What is it supposed to accomplish? I take it for granted that the Senator from Arizona will not deny that some of the newspapers of the country have felt that if they could have legislation of this kind passed they would buy their news-print paper at a lower price than they can get it for under the agreement that has been made betweeen the manufacturers and the Federal Trade Commission.

Yesterday the Senator from Arizona stated that users of print paper have paid as high as 9 cents a pound for it. I say now, without fear of successful contradiction, that no news-print-paper manufacturer in all of the United States ever charged 9 cents for a pound of paper, or 7 cents, or 6 cents. It may be true that some news-print-paper distributor located in some little town away out West, in dealing with some little paper that wanted to print a few pages of an issue once a month, and required a roll of paper to be divided, has charged 9 cents a pound. There may be one case of that kind in the United States; but it is brought up here as an awful example of what the manufacturers of paper in this country are doing to the consumers of print paper in this country.

Ninety per cent of the paper that is used in the United States to-day is purchased at a price the increase of which is less than the increase in the price of 75 per cent of the commodities of the United States.

I hold no brief for the paper manufacturers. I know little about their business, but I know that they are in business for the same purposes as other concerns are in business. They all ought to be protected by the same laws, and no different ones. They ought to have the same privileges that other concerns have, and no more. If they have been formed into a monopoly, and are charging undue prices for their product, we have laws upon the statute books to reach them; and if those laws are not ample, I am perfectly willing that they shall be strengthened.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to suggest that one difficulty about the law is that by the time you proceed and get any results by an attempt to enforce the law, injuries will have occurred and losses and inconveniences and disturbances which can not be remedied. I think the record shows that these people did violate the antitrust law. They formed a combination which finally, under this proceeding, resulted in fines aggregating $11,000, and the result of that combination was that they cleaned up something like $15,000,000 of profit; and the combination that they formed was unquestionably a clear violation of the law. There are only, I think, six or seven manufacturers who have signed the agreement with the Attorney General, leaving some fifty or sixty outside who have not signed it; and if they continue any such arrangement as they had before, I am afraid you will not accomplish very much by invoking the antitrust law on them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think that any of the manufacturers of print paper in this country would like to go to jail. If the jail sentences provided in the existing law are not enough, make them greater. If the law has not been enforced, Congress is not to blame for that. I believe that wherever a combination in restraint of trade is shown, it ought to be handled by the authorities of the United States Government. But, Mr. President, in this joint resolution we are singling out one industry, and saying that that industry, from now on, shall be absolutely controlled by the Government of the United States. If the country has come to such a pass that individual initiative shall cease, and that all of the business of the country shall be directed by one director general appointed by the President of the United States, let us take them all in, and not single out one industry. Let us be fair to them all or let us notify the socialists of America and the socialists of the world that the only way to run the business interests of the country is to have the Government of the United States control them all.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I have not arrived at such a conclusion; and woe be to the Government that tries to maintain itself by having a single power control all of the energies of all the people of the country!

I had thought, Mr. President, when this piece of legislation was to be discussed in the Senate that we could have Senators present to listen to what was said upon it; but evidently there is a feeling among the Senators that no matter what legislation is asked by the administration or by any department of the Government—or now it has gotten even to a commission—we ought to pass it without a question. There are other provisions of the bill that are just as objectionable as those to which I have referred, but what is more surprising than all is that this class of legislation should be brought before the Senate of the United States and recommended by a joint committee of the Senate and the House even for favorable consideration.

Mr. President, I hope this measure will be defeated. If it passes, it will be a notice to the people of the United States that Congress is in favor of legislation granting a commission power to make or destroy any business organization in the United States that is engaged in making print paper. If this power is going to be given, and if it is exercised, I would prefer that it apply to all engaged in the business, rather than that particular ones that may be selected may be marked for slaughter.

Therefore, Mr. President, I certainly hope that the Senate of the United States will not vote for any such measure.

Mr. OWEN obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me for just a minute? I have to attend a committee meeting.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to say in this connection—it will take only a minute—that I am inclined to favor the amendment, which has come up in my absence, which provides that 90 per cent instead of 75 per cent of the amount ascertained by the Federal Trade Commission shall be paid pending the determination of the question of compensation. In other words, I am inclined to believe that it would hardly be fair to the manufacturers, who will have a right to appeal from any decision made by the Federal Trade Commission, to withhold one-fourth of the amount involved; and I would favor the amendment which proposes to change 75 to 90 per cent. That is somewhat in line with the agreement made by the Attorney General with certain manufacturers as a result of the litigation in New York State. There none of the amount is withheld. The parties have a right to appeal to the court from the decision of the Federal Trade Commission as to the whole sum involved. I think that if this 75 per cent were changed to 90 per cent it would improve the joint resolution and would be more fair and just.

In that connection, Mr. President, I think it might be well to insert in the RECORD the agreement made on the 26th day of November, 1917, between the Attorney General and certain manufacturers or representatives of manufacturers. As I understand, six or seven manufacturers have signed the agreement. It bears upon this question.

Mr. SMOOT. They produce, however, the great bulk of the news-print paper in the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is true. I think they are the larger manufacturers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the matter being printed in the RECORD? If not, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

This agreement, made this 26th day of November, 1917, between Thomas W. Gregory, the Attorney General of the United States, and his successor or successors in office, as trustee, acting herein in behalf of each and every individual, firm, or corporation publishing a newspaper and using news-print paper in his or its business in the United States that now is, or during the life of this agreement shall become, a customer of any of the parties of the second part to this agreement, party of the first part, and the undersigned engaged in the manufacture and sale of news-print paper, parties of the second part: Witnesseth:

Whereas heretofore differences have arisen between the manufacturers and users of news-print paper as to the price and terms at which such paper should be sold, and such differences have heretofore been brought to the attention of the Federal Trade Commission; and

Whereas the Department of Justice of the United States has instituted, or is about to institute proceedings in equity under section 4 of the act of July 2, 1890, entitled an act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies; and

Whereas it is desirable in the present condition of affairs in the United States that some adjustment of the trade conditions in news-print paper should be had, it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows:

First. The United States may file a petition in equity to enjoin any operations of the News Print Paper Manufacturers' Association and of the manufacturers who are members of that association, in so far as such operations are claimed to constitute a restraint of trade. In such proceeding the parties of the second part will consent to a decree as prayed for, reserving the right at the time such consent to a decree is presented to the court to make such statements, oral or written, not impairing the binding force of the decree as they are advised may be necessary to protect their interests. The petition may also pray for the dissolution of the News Print Manufacturers' Association, and if a request be made to that end the parties of the second part will consent thereto.

Second. The price of news-print paper on the basis of 24 by 36 inches in size, weighing approximately 32 pounds per 500 sheets, on all new contracts from now to January 1, 1918, and on all contract in existence on January 1, 1918, or made thereafter, and on all sales and deliveries in the United States shall not exceed the following amounts:

(a) From January 1, 1918, until April 1, 1918, for such news-print paper in rolls, $3 per hundred pounds f. o. b. at the mill, in car-load lots, and $3.25 per hundred pounds f. o. b. at the mill, in less-than-car-load lots, and for such news-print paper in sheets, $3.50 per hundred pounds f. o. b. at the mill, in car-load lots, and $3.75 per hundred pounds f. o. b. at the mill in less-than-car-load lots. The foregoing subdivision (2–a) shall not apply to the Minnesota & Ontario Power Co. nor the Fort Frances Pulp & Paper Co. (Ltd.); but as to said two companies, the Federal Trade Commission, after due hearing and investigation and subject to review as provided in subdivision 2–b, shall fix the just and reasonable maximum prices and terms of contract for said two companies from January 1, 1918, until April 1, 1918, effective January 1, 1918.

(b) After April 1, 1918, the just and reasonable maximum prices and terms of contracts for the sale of all or any news-print paper shall be determined and fixed by the Federal Trade Commission, after due hearing and investigation, subject to review by the circuit judges of the second circuit, who, if of opinion that the prices or terms of contract fixed by the commission are unjust or unreasonable, shall determine what are just and reasonable. Such judges shall have the right to hear any pertinent matter considered by the Federal Trade Commission and additional evidence or matter if it shall be shown to their satisfaction that such additional evidence or matter is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce the same in the proceedings before the commission. The maximum prices and terms of contract so determined shall continue during the war and for three months thereafter, with the right to any of the parties of the second part or to the Department of Justice to ask the Federal Trade Commission for an investigation and determination of new prices or terms of contract whenever during such period conditions arise which in the opinion of either make it desirable to ask for any change in price or terms of contract, subject to the same right of review. In determining the prices to be effective April 1, 1918, the Federal Trade Commission shall consider all pertinent conditions, including those prevailing during the months of January, February, and March, 1918, to the end that the prices when announced shall cover the facts as near the time of the effective date of the new prices as is possible.

Third. The parties of the second part, during the life of this agreement, shall offer their news-print paper for sale in accordance with paragraph second hereof. In case of sale by written contract, said paragraph shall be embodied therein, either wholly or by sufficient reference thereto; but if any customer of any of the parties of the second part who is offered paper in accordance with the provision of this agreement prefers to make or retain a contract for a fixed price for any definite period, and any one of the parties of the second part, after duly notifying the Attorney General of his or its intention in the matter, shall make or retain such contract solely in deference to the wishes of the consumer, such agreement so made shall not be construed as a violation of this agreement, even though the price which the consumer pays in furtherance of his own interest is in excess of the prices fixed in this agreement.

Fourth. The parties of the second part agree that, to the extent of their power, they will cause such of their news-print paper as is ordinarily purchased by the so-called small publishers through the intervention of jobbers, dealers, or other middlemen to be delivered to such small publishers at not to exceed reasonable and just prices and terms of sale to be established by the Federal Trade Commission (subject to review by the circuit judges in the manner aforesaid).

Fifth. The party of the first part, or his successor in office, as trustee of an express trust, may bring any appropriate action, suit, or proceeding in law or in equity to enforce this agreement on behalf of any person, firm, or corporation injured or damaged by a violation of the terms hereof, and may proceed by preliminary injunction or otherwise to restrain violations of the terms hereof.

Sixth. Books of account and records of parties of the second part and of all corporations or other instrumentalities owned or controlled by them shall be open to inspection of the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission during the life of this agreement, upon reasonable notice, in so far as said books and records relate to the manufacture and sale of news-print paper.

Seventh. The liability of the parties of the second part hereunder is several and not joint. Any manufacturer of news-print paper may become a party to this agreement by signing the same or a counterpart hereof; all counterparts hereof shall be deemed one and the same instrument.

In witness whereof each of the parties of the second part has caused its corporate name and seal to be hereunto affixed by its proper officers thereunto duly authorized and has set after its name the approximate present daily tonnage of news-print paper which it is subjecting to the terms of this agreement.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, republics can not be successfully carried on, except where the people are educated and informed with regard to current affairs by a free and unembarrassed press. Printing paper at a fair price is vital to a free press. This monopoly of print paper strikes at the most vital interests of the people of the United States, because it strikes at the ability of the publishers of newspapers and magazines in securing their supplies of print paper.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] lays great stress upon the power which would be given to the President of the United States or the Trade Commission under this joint resolution, and argues that putting the power in the hands of the authorized agents of the United States might result in closing up a paper manufacturing establishment in Maine or in some other State. That argument, broadly, would go to the final conclusion that the President of the United States should not have any power lest he abuse it. It is incredible that the President of the United States would close a paper manufacturing company in Maine or in any other State. It is not a question of closing a paper manufacturing company in Maine or in any other State. It is a question of putting the firm and patient hand of the Government upon the lawless profiteers, those of the print-paper manufacturers, who are taking unfair advantage of the publishers of the United States, and thus taking advantage of the people of the United States at a vital point.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is it not true that the Federal Trade Commission have agreed that the price that is being charged for print paper now is not an exorbitant price?

Mr. OWEN. I do not absolutely know whether it is or not, but I do not think it is at all material whether they have or not. I do know now that these unrestrained profiteers have been laying their heavy hands upon the publishers of this country, and that they have been in a position to put out of business every little country newspaper in the land and have put them in jeopardy and in fear of ruin.

Mr. SMOOT. That statement, of course, can not be——

Mr. OWEN. That is a statement which I am justified in making here from this record, and I call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I can name any number of little country newspapers that have never been put out of business in my own State, as I suppose the same is true as to the Senator's State.

Mr. OWEN. The fact that they have not been killed is no reason why this power should be left in the hands of this unrestrained monopoly to kill them.

Mr. SMOOT. I was only referring to what the Senator said, that they had all been put out of business.

Mr. OWEN. I did not say they all had been put out of business. I said they were in a position to be put out of business; that they could be put out of business by this greedy, ruthless monopoly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. OWEN. I will be pleased to hear the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. A great New York newspaper, one of the very few absolutely independent ones, has made its contracts for this year at 2½ cents a pound.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, and I know that some of the western mills have made contracts at 2½ cents a pound.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, can the Senator say that it is not exorbitant when these companies charge 7 and 9 cents a pound?

Mr. SMOOT. I asked the question as to whether the Federal Trade Commission had not said that it was not exorbitant. I know that newspapers in Ohio and other parts of the country are paying 3 cents under the agreement made by the manufacturers of news-print paper with the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, these unscrupulous profiteers were reported by the Trade Commission as having charged as high as 9 cents for print paper, and I regard the report of the Federal Trade Commission as worthy of full credit.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They admitted it in their plea of nolle contendere when the indictment was brought against them.

Mr. SMOOT. I say there is no manufacturer of print paper who has ever sold print paper at 9 cents a pound.

Mr. OWEN. Then the Senator disagrees with the Trade Commission report.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had been here, he would have heard the explanation I made.

Mr. OWEN. I have the report of the commission itself, and it states positively that while paper sold before the war at 2 cents, it has been pushed up as high as 9 cents a pound.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care what the report says; the paper that was sold at 9 cents a pound was sold by paper distributors, not by manufacturers.

Mr. GALLINGER. In small lots.

Mr. SMOOT. In small lots—less than roll lots.

Mr. OWEN. It matters not whether these profiteers themselves, directly or through agents, were contriving in their lawless greed to throttle the publishers of the country. The methods of the manipulation of print paper is exhibited. The indictment of Philip T. Dodge, the president of the International Paper Co., sufficiently shows what the nefarious practices were. The fraud charged against him together with the president of the Laurentide Co. and other members of the News Print Manufacturers' Association shows that they had agreed in carrying on their trade—

First. To refrain from competing with each other in the matter of securing new customers for their paper—

A violation of the laws of the United States—

Second. To refrain from competing with each other as to the quality of the paper to be sold—

A violation of the laws of the United States—

Third. To refrain from competing with each other as to delivery of and furnished storage for paper sold but not delivered—

Another violation of the law—

Fourth. To refrain from competing with each other as to terms of credit; rate of interest on open accounts; dates of beginning and ending of contracts; the methods of making sales of paper through salesmen, dealers, and jobbers; the payment of return freight on the cores upon which their paper was wrapped; payment of charges for cartage; and allowance of claims for waste or damaged paper—

Another violation of the statute—

Fifth. To engage in simultaneous representations to the public, to their customers, and to each other, of the alleged increased cost of manufacture and of the alleged shortage of news print paper, and to manufacture insufficient quantities of such paper, with the object of concertedly working for materially higher prices—

Another violation of the statutes of the United States, a violation intended to aid these profiteers in levying tribute upon the publishers of the newspapers of this land.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Assume that all these facts are true and assume that these men ought to be sent to the penitentiary for constant infractions of the Sherman antitrust law; assume that there is a gigantic monopoly which has charged extortionate prices for the paper which has been disposed of to the newspapers of the United States or to intermediate companies which have furnished the paper to the newspapers, does the Senator think that that fact or series of facts justifies the Federal Government in going into the newspaper business and performing the functions that ought to devolve upon private enterprises?

Mr. OWEN. I answer the Senator that when the statute has been persistently and viciously disregarded by these men, when the statute which Congress through more than 20 years has been perfecting failed to protect the publishers of this land, then I say the drastic hand of the Government should be put upon these things, and that the power of the Government should be used to restrain these profiteers from their nefarious conduct. It will not necessitate having the Government going into the newspaper business; the power to do so will teach these greedy men some decency for fear of the Government's power, which they do not now properly respect.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. There are manufacturers of print paper in this country who are not unscrupulous profiteers.

Mr. OWEN. I am glad to be informed of this and have not doubted that there were such honest manufacturers of print paper.

Mr. HALE. I have in mind a great corporation in my State which is charging substantially 2½ cents a pound right along through all the high prices. Is it not true that this legislation will apply equally to the man who has done a fair business and to the man who has done an unfair business?

Mr. OWEN. No; it is not. The administrative officers of the Government of the United States will take cognizance of the honorable conduct of such concerns as have been referred to by the Senator from Maine, and the Government of the United States would under no circumstances interfere with the legitimate, ordinary affairs of such upright, honorable manufacturers.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, for the enlightenment of the Senator from Maine, I will state that the joint resolution itself in the first amendment I have offered, taken in connection with the other amendments, leaves those men absolutely free, as long as they are doing a legitimate, fair business, from the Government interfering with them in the least degree. It is only the monopolistic cases, the unfair dealings, that the joint resolution proposes to touch at all. The amendment that I have offered, as the Senator will see in the reprint of the joint resolution, justifies the statement that no legitimate trade will be interfered with in any particular by the resolution, and a man like the one to whom the Senator from Maine refers will be absolutely protected in his rights.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to make this observation: The people of the United States are face to face now with determining whether or not they will have this Government controlled by an intelligent democracy or threatened by organized State socialism. Make no mistake about that. The Nonpartisan League which was organized in North Dakota has taken charge of the offices there and elected every one of the candidates in the State with one exception. Out of 113, I think, it elected 112, because it discovered that the elevator system and the commission system had systematically robbed the producers of that State and the consumers of that State of the lawful profit on their labor, estimated at $55,000,000 in one wheat crop. No wonder the people of that State would not submit to it, and they are beginning to organize in Idaho and Montana and a number of other States. We either must have an intelligent democracy in this country, which will put its hands on unrestrained private greed, or we will have to meet the menace of State socialism as an unavoidable consequence.

These men were indicted also because they cooperated—

Sixth. In discouraging the creation of new mills or the installation of new machines for the manufacture of news print.

Seventh. To cooperate in preventing new concerns from competing with them by transferring orders and contracts for paper to new concerns on condition that such new companies should not compete with them.

Eighth. To furnish from time to time to the News Print Manufacturers' Association, at No. 18 East Forty-first Street, New York City, for the information of the defendants, full and complete information concerning contracts with their customers and the quantity of the paper manufactured, carried in stock or sold by them, also the capacity of their various plants and other details of their businesses.

Here was a whole series of acts in violation of the statute which had been on the books of this Republic over a full generation, and which Congress has been from time to time trying to perfect. But the condition of our judiciary system, the difficulty of indictment, the difficulty of bringing to speedy trial, the difficulty of bringing to speedy punishment those who violate our statutes show two things: First, that our judicial system ought to be revised so as to make it as effective as the English system; and it shows, second, that because our statutes fail to meet the needs of this country we are forced to provide a mechanism that shall lay the hand of Government more quickly and directly upon the men who undertake to rob the publishers of this land. And here comes in before us the report of this committee of both Houses telling us of the appeals that have been made by the National Editorial Association at its convention in Minneapolis July 12, in which they say:

Whereas for the past 18 months there has been a determined and persistent effort on the part of the print-paper manufacturers and jobbers to create a panic market for print paper; and

Whereas for several months they have succeeded in making the publishers believe that there was good and sufficient reasons for the extraordinary prices they were charging, but during the past seven or eight months it has been clearly demonstrated by the investigations of the Federal Trade Commission and by your legislative committee that there was, and is, no good reason for the large advances made, as the Trade Commission clearly demonstrated that there had been but a very slight increase in the cost of manufacture: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Editorial Association in convention assembled at Minneapolis calls upon Congress to pass legislation immediately that will give the Federal Trade Commission power to fix prices and operate the mills and distribute the print paper manufactured in the United States during the period of the present war in accordance with the recommendations of the Trade Commission in its report to Congress. And further be it

Resolved, That arrangements be made with the Canadian Government so that the print paper manufactured in Canada and shipped into this country shall also be handled by the Trade Commission in order that all the publishers of the United States may be provided with sufficient paper at a reasonable price.

Now, this memorial and other memorials of like character come to the Senate of the United States and appeal to us to protect the publishers of this country against the frauds that have been perpetrated upon them and upon the people of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, does he think that that association is accurate enough to receive the indorsement of any reasonable man when they say that there has not been any considerable increase in the cost of the production of anything on this continent. Is it conceivable——

Mr. OWEN. They said that the Trade Commission have demonstrated there has been but a very slight increase in the cost of manufacturing paper.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator himself believe that?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly I believe that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator believes it?

Mr. OWEN. I fully believe it, and am justified by the evidence of our honorable Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the Senator, of course, is irreconcilable as far as my attitude is concerned.

Mr. OWEN. I have great respect for the Trade Commission that heard both sides and could determine where the truth lay; and when these greedy monopolists and violators of law are indicted for repeated violations of the statutes of the United States I do not regard their testimony as Holy Writ by any manner of means.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will further permit me——

Mr. OWEN. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not going to be terrified by the Senator's enthusiasm in this matter. Does the Senator believe that any great manufacturing enterprise in this country is producing its products without a very considerable added expense beyond what it was a few years ago?

Mr. OWEN. Some of them have a greatly increased expense and others have not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to know what——

Mr. OWEN. In this case we have a report of the Trade Commission of the United States, that heard both sides and determined what the truth was, and the truth of their statement is abundantly verified and demonstrated and proven by the statement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that there is a great corporation in his State that is now selling paper for 2¼ cents a pound.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator knows that the price of timber of every description has increased almost four times over what it cost a few years ago.

Mr. OWEN. The suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire is answered by the statement which I have just made, that this great company is selling print paper at 2¼ cents a pound and, of course, at a profit.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be.

Mr. OWEN. The suggestions I have made are, therefore, well founded.

Mr. GALLINGER. But before the war they sold for even less than that.

Mr. OWEN. They sold before the war, I understand, on an average of about 2 cents.

Mr. GALLINGER. What I want to emphasize is this—and I know something about it—that the cost of the raw material in the manufacture of paper has enormously increased; that wages have enormously increased.

Mr. OWEN. That may be; but still this great, honest company sells for 2¼ cents a pound, while this combination of profiteers have been selling paper as high as 9 cents.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; they never did.

Mr. OWEN. That is what the Trade Commission said, and I believe them in preference to the self-serving statements of the profiteers.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Trade Commission did not state the truth in that respect any more than when they say there has been no substantial increase in the cost of producing print paper.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Whether the Federal Trade Commission stated the truth or not, these gentlemen divided the whole territory out amongst themselves.

Mr. GALLINGER. We are not talking about that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. These are the real facts. They divided the territory among themselves. This very combination one year ago offered to the Government paper at 7¼ cents. The Trade Commission fixed the price at a reasonable rate, away below what they are claiming we should give them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator will excuse me. They divided the territory. The Senator is now claiming that the news-paper manufacturers are not getting a profit. No; they are not getting it; they are simply handing over each one of the districts free from intrusion, free from the competition of any other news-paper print concern in America. They permit their agents to hand it out to the country newspapers, and they are handing it out at 9 cents a pound. That is what they have been paying for it. The newspapers have been furnished in that particular section that nobody can invade except this man, and they hide behind the fact that the agent is a party to the robbery. We find that the manufacturer and those acting under him are in a combination to rob the publishers at the rate of 9 cents a pound.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. My cook the other day paid for a bag of coal at the rate of $28 a ton. Does the Senator think that is an indictment against the men who are mining coal and selling coal to the people of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. When you prove to me that the coal was in the hands of seven different gentlemen, only one of whom was allowed to sell coal in Washington, and that coal was selling cheaper in every other district not so controlled by that particular corporation or company or trust, I say unquestionably that the man who sold that coal at $28 a ton ought to be sent to the penitentiary.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is romancing now.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think it is legitimate.

Mr. GALLINGER. The fact that a little batch of paper, half a roll, perhaps, was sold by some dealer in some country town to a country newspaper at 9 cents a pound, whether it be true or not, does not carry any conviction to my mind that the men who are producing paper had anything to do with it whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. I note the Senator made a statement which may be misconstrued, or I at least misunderstood him. I understood the Senator to say that the newspaper manufacturers today charge the Government 7¼ cents for news-print paper.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They actually refused to deliver it. They left the Government at the mercy of jobbers and they would supply it to the jobbers. They offered it under those conditions to the Government at 7¼ cents.

Mr. SMOOT. I have never known the Government of the United States to pay 7¼ cents for print paper.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You can buy it at two and a half now.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and never paid any more. I think they paid one day——

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Arizona did not say the Government paid seven and a fourth cents a pound. He said these manufacturers' agents tried to get the Government to pay that price. There is a vast difference between attempting a fraud on the Government and succeeding in it.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think they even offered it at that.

Mr. OWEN. There is a vast difference between the attempt at fraud and succeeding in the attempt, and the Senator from Utah can safely enter his negation of the latter with perfect propriety. In view of the vast profits of this combination in one year estimated at seventeen and one-half million dollars, no excuse of increased cost of production of paper will exculpate them from the charge of extortion, so fully established by the Government.

Mr. President, one of the most evil consequences of this banded lot of profiteers and pirates, one of the worst consequences of their gross misconduct, is this, that they have put themselves by virtue of this vicious monopoly in a position where they could dictate to the press of this country and deny to a publisher an orderly, constant, reasonable supply of paper, which is so vital to the commercial and financial life of any newspaper. A paper which does not get the means with which to regularly print its issues would go out of business. The free American press has been intimidated by this trust. It is quite a surprise to me that this editorial association would have the courage to publicly ask for relief against these commercial masters. One of the greatest evils to America would be the power to suppress the newspaper press of this Republic. One of the principal means by which the autocracy of Germany and of Austria have established monarchy and the military power with which they are governing their people now has been the suppression of a free press and the ignorance and misdirection of public opinion in unhappy Germany. They declared in the secret treaty at Verona, in the second article, their solemn purpose to suppress the freedom of the press in order to maintain monarchy and autocracy. If we allow the commercial profiteers of this country to lay their heavy hands upon the free press of America, we permit a condition to arise the far-reaching consequences of which no man can foresee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think there will be any danger to the freedom of the press in the future if the supply of print paper upon which the press is depending is in the control of the Government itself?

Mr. OWEN. I do not believe under the joint resolution there will be any danger whatever to any newspaper or to any honest, legitimate paper manufacturing company. I have confidence in the officers of the United States, whether those officers be Democrats or Republicans, and I think they are about half-and-half. I do not regard this as a partisan matter, and I deprecate the suggestion that it should be considered in that way.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I made no such suggestion whatever.

Mr. OWEN. Perhaps not, but a Senator very near him said sotto voce that such power would be used for partisan purposes, and he was heard throughout the Chamber.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not hear him. The Senator was commenting on the power of the German and Austrian Governments to suppress the press of those countries, and it occurred to me that we were about to clothe our Government with a portion of that power.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, we can clothe our own Government with power without the slightest fear, because the people of the United States control this Government. The sovereignty is vested in the people of the United States, and their representatives, whether executive or legislative, Republican or Democratic, will respond to the will of the people. We are in no danger when we put power in the hands of our Executive.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator belfeve that this should be confined merely to the period of the war?

Mr. OWEN. I do not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator believes it should be a permanent policy?

Mr. OWEN. I think it should be a permanent policy, until these gentlemen have been taught the lesson of good behavior.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, Senators have suggested that we must take our choice between a socialistic state and an intelligent democracy. If it were a matter of an intelligent democracy governing the country as manifested by the provisions of this resolution, I could support it. It does not so present itself to me. It is a question of a choice between an intelligent, active democracy and a quasi combination of bureaucrats suffering from a chronic and incurable inertia. That is the complaint from which popular government is now suffering in this country, and this is merely a manifestation of the general disease. If it were only a question of lodging power in Congress, I would turn to the Constitution and find out what our limit of power is. Our powers are legislative. The administrative and executive powers are lodged elsewhere. But when I search four years of legislation I find in it a continuous abdication of congressional power. It is not a question of Congress exercising its governmental powers, which are purely legislative in character. It is a further surrender of those powers into departments and bureaus. This resolution forges another link in the endless chain of delegated legislative power to boards, commissions, and departments.

I remember that the Senator who last had the floor not long since introduced a resolution, which can be found with but little search, censuring the Supreme Court of the United States because it had the judicial temerity to set aside acts of Congress as in contravention of the organic law of the country. That resolution demands that whenever a member of the Supreme Court of the Government concurs in or writes a decision setting aside an act of Congress as unconstitutional, he thereby declares by his judicial conduct the office vacant, and the Executive is empowered to fill the vacancy so created. The reason that I have heard given to sustain such a condemnation of the court is that it is a denial or an impairment of the sovereign power of Congress; that it is in effect an usurpation of legislative power by the judiciary.

Comment has been made upon the unlimited powers of an act of Parliament that the court of last resort of England never sets aside an act of Parliament. That is true; and if you will carry the analogy further I will agree with the conclusion at which gentlemen arrive when they consider conditions in the British Empire. There is no such thing as a written constitution in England. Some of her colonial dependencies have written constitutions; they have been written since the one under which we act was written; but, as to England herself, the only constitution she has is found in acts of Parliament of a general character, in decisions of her courts of last resort, in that great body of maxims called the common law, in certain immemorial usages that have cost the heads or scepters of English kings and have sent thousands of her people to die upon the battle field. They have built up an instrument which is as binding as anything ever committed to human parchment.

The English King to-day is but little more than the head of a dress circle in an evening reception in England. He possesses not so much power as the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. He is the semblance of a once crowned monarch. To-day King George is but little more than the memory and the residuary shell of monarchical power in the Old World.

I sometimes wish that we should heed the lesson of the English people; that we would curb our seemingly irresistible tendency to build up a mighty executive power in this country. The President of the United States is the fountain head of all patronage; he is the head of tremendous political power as well as of a great political party.

Notwithstanding these are war times and we are exhorted by sundry admonitions of all the faithful to forget our politics, we can not forget the actions of those who would delegate all power to the head of a partisan organization. This joint resolution is not a war measure; it is a measure to still more firmly rivet upon the press of this country a supreme and uncontrollable censorship. At present a censorship is practically exercised by denying postal facilities to an offending publication and the searching provisions of the espionage act. That ought in ordinary times to seem enough. However, it is evident that more power yet is sought. Under this measure, coupled with the espionage law, a newspaper can not only be prosecuted but its supply of print paper can be withheld. This completes the authority. From it there is no appeal. The passage of such a joint resolution adds one more department or one more power to that immense number of bureaus that now make the most complete circumlocution office there is in the world. When Dickens in a novel invented the phrase embodied in his "circumlocution office," he seemed to have had prophetic insight into what would happen to us in the years to come.

You remember when the poet Byron, Mrs. Shelley, and three others on the banks of a river in Italy, where they were spending some time, floated down the river to the seashore one evening, after they had dined both sociably and well, separated with an agreement that each of them should write a novel that would be completely a work of the imagination, in which no human element of probability would be found, but which yet might be in the development of the future chemical and biological research of mankind. Four of those novels are unknown to the world and to its literature. But one, that of Mrs. Shelley, remains. It is a novel known as Frankenstein, in which the monster is not Frankenstein, but the creator of the monster is Frankenstein, who suffers all the melancholy experiences and undergoes all the dangers consequent upon the exercise of an unhallowed power which he discovers. I do not care to do more than refer to that and to correct the ordinary use of the expression. When we speak of a "Frankenstein" we think of a monster, inhuman in his powers and remorseless in his cruelty, but Frankenstein was the creator of the monster in human form but beyond human control. He breathed into this dangerous creation, by some strange power which he discovered in his laboratory, human life, strength, and physical ability, until he was beyond the reach of the ordinary man and possessed all of the powers destructive in character that made him a terror to the regions where he roamed. Frankenstein was the victim of his misplaced power. To-day Congress is a legislative Frankenstein, a victim of its misplaced delegated powers. It is engaged in creating by repeated delegations of its lawful powers an uncontrollable executive despotism alien to free government and akin to kingcraft.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is the author of the resolution of judicial censure to which I alluded. He to-day supports here this further delegation of legislative power. He adds another hand, with hands already numerous and strong, to the bureaucratic devices to which we have already delegated so much of our power. His resolution is based upon the judicial censure of judges who have shorn Congress of the power to violate the Constitution. Of course the Constitution is a hackneyed document which now has 17 amendments; it is over a century old, and perhaps it is unfashionable to allude to it. For that reason when, in the exercise of its duty, it feels called upon to enforce any of its provisions, it draws upon itself the censure of such resolutions as that to which I have referred.

It is true the Supreme Court does at times curtail the power of Congress; it restrains the lawmaking department of the Government inside of the limits marked out by the instrument that creates us and under which we act. If that be so, it is a proper action for the Supreme Court to take; but to-day some of the Senators who believe the Supreme Court very often unjustly usurps the powers of Congress and sets aside bills which we pass are attempting still further to subtract from the power of Congress by delegating such powers as are embodied in this resolution to a commission or a bureau or a department. The support of such resolutions as this menaces the legislative power of Congress more than all the judicial usurpations from George Jeffreys to the twentieth century.

We have had some trouble in our section of the country, in common with other large centers of population, in getting print paper. The publishers in many of our Western States have found themselves in sore straits. I might parenthetically remark here that we are in no greater difficulty than are many men and women in Washington to-day who are attempting to find a place to lay their weary heads.

Mr. HARDING. Or to buy coal.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; or buying coal. There is no more profiteering by the manufacturers of print paper or by the jobbers distributing it, no, not by 100 per cent or by four or five hundred per cent, than there is by the lessees of landlords by way of subtenancies in the city of Washington. Senators talk of the jobber in print paper. The manufacturer stands at the source of supply, and it is suggested that the jobber is an evil agency that becomes the convenient medium for exacting extortionate profits from the publishers; but I know of one case—and I can multiply it by several thousand—in the city of Washington where there is a profit of 650 per cent between the original lease made by the owner of the property and the sublease which is made by the tenant who pays the rent to that owner. Six hundred and fifty per cent, when extorted from a Government clerk, is a matter of some concern to the clerk if he has a wife and five children; but I have heard no sympathetic voice raised for him in this Chamber in the discussion of this joint resolution, nor have I observed any action of any committee in an effort to relieve the person of small means who is called on to pay 650 per cent profit after the lease for the possession of the property leaves the landlord and is farmed out by some cormorant in Washington to the homeless who require some place to lay their heads.

How much saccharine matter does a housekeeper get on one trip to a grocery shop? Ten cents' worth, if she be a favored customer; otherwise she goes sugarless to rest. I have gone to eight grocery shops myself—and I am old-fashioned; I do my own marketing—and each time I was greeted with either an incredulous look or a frozen stare. But sugar has gone to the limbo of forgotten things. Had it not been for the kindly ministrations of a friend, I would have seen no sugar until the lambs were gamboling on the Maryland hills, until the Cuban crop had passed through the refinery, and the gentlemen who are collaborating with Mr. Hoover had permitted us to have sugar. I have heard no complaint about that; I am not complaining about it; I am only citing it as an illustration of what Government action can do. And it has done some of the most wonderful things in the city of Washington, which is governed, not by Congress, but by the same bureaus, my friend, to which you wish to delegate more and more power. There is not a more bureaucratic government on earth than that of the District of Columbia, and every time a bureau is created here the price of rents jump 100 per cent and the price of sugar 200 per cent.

If you go down where the inbound freights on all the great lines come into Washington and study the statistics of coal shipments arriving in the District of Columbia, you will find that 2,000 more tons of coal have come into the District of Columbia so far, to the 1st day of January this year, than in any year since I have been here. Can you find that coal? Where is it? Is it in the homes of the poor mentioned here a while ago? It is not. Can it be had at anything like reasonable prices, compared with the price paid the operator who produces the coal at the mines? It can not. Is there any profiteering? There is not. I read a long advertisement by a retail coal dealer in Washington—it has been in the newspapers for two or three days—denying that there is such a thing as profiteering in coal in Washington; he spurns the thought that the coal dealers wish to make any money; they are Good Samaritans who are distributing buckets of coal to the needy; they are engaged in an honorable struggle with the frost king, and they are giving up freely of their substance that the stove may be full of coal.

And where is the jobber? He, too, is brought before the bar of public opinion, and he, too, proves an alibi. So we are just where we were when we started; and the people of Washington are in the same condition as the average Senator of the minority party when, refreshed from his sleep, he starts in the early morning at 9 o'clock on a trip to some of the bureaus or departments in quest of useful information. He runs until a few minutes before 12 o'clock, and if he is extremely fortunate and nimble-footed he will go out of the same door he went in at 9 o'clock. Has he any information? None. What has he been doing? Wearing out his shoe leather visiting departments. Has he any answer to any query propounded to guide his constituents, to keep them free from the toils of the law, or to give them any information they desire? He has not. What has he been doing meanwhile, if I may continue this primer of elementary instruction? He has been shunted from pillar to post; he has been the circulating medium in the departments; he has been going from one branch of the circumlocution office to another, and when he gets out he rubs his hand over his puzzled eyes and wonders what he has been doing all forenoon as he heads for the Capitol to make the laws of this Republic.

I can understand why the cobbler is the only man who is amassing any wealth in Washington. These comparatively humble gentlemen who sit in stalls and holes in the wall, with half a peck of shoe pegs and a hammer, a ball of wax, and a little linen thread, are the only men who are getting ahead in the world because we are wearing out our shoe leather in Washington running around the departments and paying $12 a pair for shoes under the Hoover administration of food supplies and the like.

That is what has happened to us; and yet we are asked to delegate more power. The condition in which Mr. Frankenstein found himself will be an earthly edition of paradise compared with ours if we go on building up this governmental combination known as bureaucratic government. We are governing by bureaus when we ought to govern by laws. When we go around to the departments to find whether they have been enforcing laws that have been on the statute books for 20 years and more—since 1890—they say they are insufficient; we can not enforce them. "Why?" "Because we go into court and the jury acquits them." That is what one of the law officers of the Government told me, that a jury can not be trusted to convict. I asked, "Why?" He answered, "Well, they are the judges of fact, and they do not find that the defendants ever have enough proven on them to constitute guilt under the statute." He said, "Look at the packers out in your section; we went out and prosecuted them and tried them before a jury, but the jury went out and found them not guilty, although," he said, "everybody knew they were guilty." I said, "Of what?" He said, "Of something or other." I said, "That is the reason you tried them; you tried them for something or other. You did not try them for an offense; you tried them because you thought they were guilty of something; but you could not tell just what it was, and so you indicted them and expected the jury to find them guilty of something that they might discover from the evidence as the case went along." "It was a jury of farmers," he said, "and the farmers all sold cattle and hogs to the packers, and therefore they were prejudiced." If the jury had not been farmers, they would have been somebody who sold merchandise to farmers and the same condition would continue.

Following up that method, it has been very fashionable here to talk about the farmers This is the first measure of this character I recall being under consideration in the four years I have been here in connection with which, somehow or other, the farmer has not been thrust into the discussion. He is not in this print-paper question; but another person is in it who is in the aggregate sense just about as mythical for present purposes as the farmer, and that is the newspaper editor. The National Editorial Association met and resoluted. Editors are just like lawyers; I never knew a lot of lawyers to get together that they did not pass a resolution; and I never knew editors to get together and not improve the occasion in like manner. I remember that once a biographer, I think it was Parton, who biographied about everybody worth while in this country in his day, made a very sage remark. Everyone that he ever wrote about was a hero; I do not know of one of the characters Parton preserved to posterity that was not a hero; he was at least a demigod; he knew more than anybody else; he was born great; he inherited the purple; he had a vast quantity of brains of a superlative quality; and if he had not lived in his generation everything would have gone down, the pillars of state would have crumbled, general darkness would have ensued, and the heavens would have rolled up like a scroll in the manner that the apostle and revelator tell us about. In the midst of this tangle, of adulation—and I read these biographies when I can not sleep and am not better occupied—I found one grain of wheat. After eulogizing lawyers, editors, statesmen, divines, and generals without number he got through, ended the chapter, and indulged in one solitary philosophical reflection that has a world of truth in it when applied to practical men who do something besides talk, who do not have time to talk because they are so busy doing something. He said a government made up of lawyers, orators, and editors would be a failure because it would lack somebody who could make up his mind and do something.

The editors got together at Minneapolis and resoluted about print paper. Well, I remember they resoluted once before some years ago—in 1913, if I remember; and my good friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] remembers, as do the rest of us—they resoluted, and with resounding phrase that smote the skies, and that wasted much pure print paper and good ink, they announced that the extortionate price of print paper was because there was a customs duty on the paper, or on the chemically treated pulp, as it came through the customhouse. All you need to do to make this a newspaper heaven was to free list the product. So even some Republicans were caught by the clamor, and there was no very strenuous objection to free listing the article. Well, what happened? It went on the free list, but our editor friends did not walk in the elysium that they had supposed. Everybody fell for the argument, if you will permit the phrase here in this august Chamber, Democrats and Republicans, Progressives and unprogressives. Everybody thought it was worth trying. Like my good friend who sits here, who is absent to-day, when he voted to put hides on the free list, he thought it would lower the price of leather, and so he hearkened to the argument, and the thing was so arranged; and the senior Senator from Vermont realizes that it had no more effect on the price of leather than if he had resolved that it was a mistake.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did it not increase the price of leather? Did not leather and shoes immediately go up in price?

Mr. SHERMAN. They did; yes, sir. The Senator is entirely within the record. It had no more effect to lower it, apparently, than if he had addressed his remarks to an inhabitant of some far-off planet, but it did increase the price, or it permitted it, or it happened. Now, take your choice. A very short time afterwards prices began to increase, so print paper began to increase in price.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BECKHAM. Does the Senator think that the placing of print paper upon the free list and the placing of hides upon the free list caused the increase of the price of those articles?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer the Senator's question in this way: It did not cause the price to go down.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the price went up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Going back, now, to many a hard-fought phrase in the years past, whenever anything did not go down we said it ought to go up as a result of the same action. I do not know; I do not suppose I could demonstrate it mathematically to the Senator, but in years past when we placed a duty on anything, and somebody had to pay a penny more for it, it was anathematized as the result of the protective tariff. That always followed, and we have carried the load many times, the burden has come to us in the heat of the day, that the duty was responsible for the increase in price. You took off the duty and it acted just the same way, only about a thousand per cent worse.

I will let my friend from Kentucky answer the conundrum that he has propounded. I can not demonstrate it to his satisfaction, and maybe not to anybody's. I can only say that the promises that were made and the legislative changes that were made produced no result of a kind corresponding with what was promised, but that, on the contrary, they did cause the price to advance. If the tariff is a tax, it never acts like one, and the protective tariff lowers prices and gives us our own markets.

We are facing here the proposition of delegating to the Federal Trade Commission the power contained in this joint resolution.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDING. Appropriate to the immediate discussion of the change in price, it is authoritatively stated that after paper was put on the free list there was no increase of production in this country of any character whatever, while prior to the elimination of the tariff on paper we had been increasing our tonnage in news print approximately 250,000 tons per year for a period of something like 15 years; so the inference may be drawn rationally that the abnormal increase in the price of paper was due almost directly to placing it on the free list, because by that act we stopped the increase of American production, while the demand was going on all the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. We went across into Canada when we stopped our production, if I remember the conditions correctly. Others followed them who are more conversant with this business than I am. We went across into Canada to import. The Dominion of Canada changed her laws so that the wood from which the pulp is made can not be brought into the United States in its unmanufactured form. The result was that the manufacturing was done in Canada. Not only was the wood stopped from being imported in its raw form, but the Crown lands of Canada were so arranged in the leases made to those producing the wood pulp that we paid tribute to Canada on her Crown lands because of the export duty or the regulations attending the export into our country of the needed supplies of print paper or of wood pulp.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARREN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator from Illinois, who is making such a strong and admirable and interesting address and showing so many reasons for voting against the joint resolution which is under consideration by the Senate, will pretermit the discussion of the tariff heresies just suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] as well as the Senator from Illinois, because some of us who are going to vote against the joint resolution might be considered by some of our friends as having yielded to these heretical views and antagonized the bill because of the arguments on the tariff.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appreciate the scruples of the Senator and will respect them. I will say that he may not have been here at the time this controversy was embarked upon, but it began incidentally and not as the main point in view. As the man said who once took out a hound and shot him, "He was a good hound, but when we were after a wolf he branched off and chased too many rabbits." This may forensically be called a rabbit chase, on the side. I will get back now after the wolf in this joint resolution—that is, from your viewpoint. From our viewpoint we think it is very material, and even more important than the basic principles of this bill. But I realize that when there is a union of allies we must not complain about the different views which nations may hold about their respective ideas of domestic policy. So the Senator is right in cautioning those who are against this joint resolution not to use what some might consider heretical arguments.

But, Mr. President, we are building up here in war times a series of powers which will return to plague us time out of mind in the years to come. I think that the Trade Commission is fairly busy now. I have the good fortune to know one or two of its members, men of ability—one lawyer in particular in whom I have great confidence, who has the happy faculty of doing things instead of talking about them—and I think they are occupied. I happen to know further, relating to this territory where we need a great deal of print paper to communicate intelligence to each other—we would have nothing to read on the elevated railroad in the morning unless it were for the cheap morning editions—keeping that in mind, I remember to-day, Mr. President, that the Trade Commission a year and a half ago exercised the power of bringing before it the print-paper manufacturers. They conferred at various times and places, through their representatives, with these manufacturers. They actually did enter into an agreement. That agreement on the part of the paper producers may have been actuated by a fear of prosecution under the antitrust law. I do not know what their motive was; but it is sufficient to say that there was an agreement made, and it is in existence. I have a copy of it in my files. All of the Chicago newspapers were affected by it. The country newspapers, even those that are published twice a week, were affected by it. Prices were fixed at a variable scale. I think, in some instances, as low as $2.50 per hundred. The price of paper in small quantities going to country newspapers was fixed, I think, at $3.50, at which price the country newspapers, many of them, assured me they could get along; that they could live. They said that everything else was going up, and they were not complaining at the small advance, if it only kept within the bounds of their ability to pay.

I will say that these prices are not greater prices, when you compare the advance, than the advance in almost every other needed article. All the footgear, leather manufactures of all kinds, leather findings, the metals raw and in their manufactured form, clothing, both wool and cotton fabrics, have increased in price many fold. It is useless to take the time here to enumerate these articles. I could produce here tables of learned length and thunderous sound to demonstrate all this, but it would not throw any more light on this discussion than the mere statement, because we are familiar with it.

So these contracts were made, and print paper was delivered under the contracts for a long time. I think it is delivered under it yet. The joint resolution, however, proposes not to regulate the paper manufacturers or the jobbers by law; it proposes to take possession of their factories and to run them by law. Of course I know the joint resolution is not in express terms that way, but the necessary effect of it is. Whenever you pool the product of which I may manufacture a certain per cent, control its prices and its distribution, then you are controlling the production.

I do not care what men may say about manufacturers still retaining control of their plants; the prices are fixed; the quantities and the terms of sale are fixed. Who is to buy does not depend upon the vendor; it depends upon the commission. The commission can go out into Utah and into Illinois and say to certain publishers: "You shall have paper," and to the paper manufacturers whose product is pooled, and the central point of which is the Trade Commission, "You must sell to certain men in Utah and certain men in Illinois." "On what terms?" "Oh, on easy terms"—just like tax paying. Everything is easy until pay day comes. We have not reached pay day on most of our undertakings. It is like "the morning after," Mr. President, the time when the ice water and the towels arrive. The repentance always comes after it is too late.

Here in this particular transaction the product is pooled, and the Government, through the Trade Commission, undertakes to say how the product shall be sold. If the Government does not make any better success of managing print paper than it has of a host of other things, where it has meddled in essentially private undertakings, then may Heaven deliver us and the editors of the association who passed the resolution from the consequences of the acts demanded by their own resolution!

We have attempted to regulate by law, it is said, and the Senator was quite emphatic in his statement that regulation had failed. If that be so, then nothing remains in this country save to take over the human being in time of peace, as well as all of his active pursuits. If a census of criminal dockets be taken, it will be found that there are no more prosecutions of corporations for violations of law than of the natural individual indicted either singly or jointly with other defendants. Criminal codes have been in existence for many centuries. The Government has them; every State has them. Every term of courts of criminal jurisdiction finds luckless individuals indicted, arraigned, and tried. This does not argue that Government regulation of individual conduct to restrain crime is a failure, but that there are certain inherent traits of human nature in some persons that lead them to break the laws, however great the punishment may be. Either through inherited tendencies or their environments or for some other reason unknown to human understanding they commit the crime and take the chances. Are we to argue from that that the Government must immediately lay its hand upon the personal liberty of everyone in the country, that civil liberty shall end, and that we shall go into a socialistic state where there is no such thing as personal civil liberty remaining?

Nobody argues that. I think it is equally unsound to say that the business enterprises of the country, whether individual or corporate, have reached the stage where regulation will fail. I think, on the contrary, that governmental regulation has succeeded; that if a census were taken of the corporations of the United States, great and small, it would show that the average business enterprise, whether corporate or individual, is a law-abiding enterprise. The difficulty is with every concern doing business in more than one State that there is not a lawyer in the United States who can advise any large concern as to what it can with safety do.

Before I came into this body my associates and myself were sometimes at our wits' end to tell associations of business men what they could do. They do not want you to tell them what they can not do. They do not need a lawyer for that. What they want lawyers for is to tell them what they can lawfully do. The corporations have had great difficulty, especially the larger ones that do business in all the States and Territories radiating out from Chicago and in foreign countries; so in that difficulty some of them have gone on and taken their chances and been indicted, in order to have an interpretation and application of the law to the particular case.

I remember that one of the best lawyers in the Northwest advised a corporation what to do. They were advised by another lawyer not to do it. They framed up their business, made their contracts, sold their merchandise, and courted an indictment by a United States grand jury, in order that they might forever set at rest the question of what they could or could not do. It was charged, when the matter came into court, that here was "another great lawless combination, setting at naught the laws of the country," when they themselves had paid out many thousands of dollars to ascertain what the laws were. All they tried to do was to continue their business.

I think regulation has not failed. On the contrary, in every instance when you could understand what the law was, in the frequent changes and interpretations put upon it, regulation has been the guide and the mentor of all the great business enterprises of this country, with certain exceptions. I will admit that there are some buccaneers in business who take their chances, just as individuals do in private life.

If they run contrary to the criminal code, they expect prosecution; but it is unfair to say that regulation has broken down when the Government has attempted to apply it to the business enterprises doing an interstate business in this country.

This means that the producer of print paper in the United States must take all of his merchandise to the Federal Trade Commission and pool it. That is all there is left for him to do. How long will he manufacture under those regulations? What incentive is there? Manufacturers have not yet reached the point where they are purely altruistic in their activities. Somebody has got to make something. I hear Senators comment with some harshness on "profiteering." I should like to know where we will get these billions of revenue from, in the years to come, unless somebody in private life makes some profit. I know of no source from which this beloved Government can draw a dollar except the private taxable wealth of the country, and you can not tax private wealth unless it has a fair return on what it is undertaking to do. So the producer of paper pulp or print paper will necessarily at last, unless he can be permitted to earn something on his investment, be driven to cease his operations. That, therefore, drives the Government to the point where it must take his plant when he stops and operate it. Then we have got the Government in the print-paper business.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator has touched a question there that has been occurring to me. Suppose the manufacturer of print paper should not find it to his profit to continue the manufacture under the regulations of the Federal Trade Commission and should choose to quit. Where does this joint resolution give the Government the power to do that which the Senator said it might do, namely, assume for itself the manufacture of print paper in that particular plant of that particular manufacturer? Where does this joint resolution empower the Government to manufacture print paper?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is not a line to that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. In lines 10 and 11.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What page?

Mr. SHERMAN. Page 2. I will read the whole of it, beginning with the amendment at the top of the page:

> That whenever during the continuance of the war and for six months thereafter the President shall deem it needful, he may direct the Federal Trade Commission to supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp and their products in the United States, and that such mills producing and such agencies distributing print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp and their products in the United States as the President shall designate shall be operated on Government account.

Mr. WOLCOTT. By whom?

Mr. SHERMAN. I assume, from the interpretation of the spirit of this joint resolution, while it is not specific in its terms, that if the owner should cease to operate the Government can operate through its agencies.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not agree with the Senator in the interpretation of that language. They are to be operated on Government account, that is true; but if the owner ceases to operate there is no authority conferred on the Government to operate on its own account, and I take it that there is no inherent power in the United States Government, in the absence of a statute, to go in and operate a business.

But let me pursue the question further, and assume that the Senator is right, that by this language there is an implied grant of power to the Government to operate a plant in case the owner ceases to operate it. Must not that power be further followed by a grant of money to finance it before there can be any actual operation of the plant?—and there is no grant of money in this bill.

Therefore, may I not suggest to the Senator that we come back to this proposition—that if the owner of the plant finds that it is no longer profitable to him to operate, and if he quits, there will not be any manufacture of paper in that plant, and a situation arises which we certainly do not want—that the quantity of output is thereby reduced?

Mr. SHERMAN. Either that would happen, as the Senator says, if he is correct in his interpretation of the joint resolution, or the Government itself must operate, taking over the plant. But while there is no money appropriated in the joint resolution, there is a fund of $100,000,000, or the balance of it, in the hands of the President, to be used for war purposes. This may not be fairly said to be for war purposes; but there will be, within the next 90 days, another issue of liberty bonds. Whether or not these mills make the kind of paper needed for these bonds, I am not sure.

Mr. SMOOT. No; they do not.

Mr. SHERMAN. They do not make anything of that kind, I understand. But print paper can easily be interpreted into a war necessity in many lines. The Army and the Navy and all the departments must have it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am inclined to consider the point I have just made a very strong point against this joint resolution. If this scheme, when it goes into operation, is going to result in the reduction of paper output in any such manner as I have suggested, then the scheme never ought to be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. One or the other must necessarily follow. Either the Government must operate or, if the private manufacturer quits, the output of that mill must cease. If they all quit in the United States because of unprofitable terms under which they must operate, then the American production will cease to be available for publishers. In that event it would be an unmixed calamity that would drive us, for our print-paper supply and for chemical pulp, into the Canadian market. There is no other country to which we have access, outside of our own. We must depend upon some part of Canada to get pulp and wood across into our own country. Mexico is out of the question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We must remember that one-third of the paper used in the United States is brought from Canada, owned by Americans operating in Canada. The proof before the Trade Commission was that the combination of these men who were indicted and convicted had suppressed the further erection of a mill in the United States by a combination in opposition to it. Therefore Americans went to Canada. One paper in the Senator's own State—the great Chicago Tribune, I think—owns its entire plant, and every ounce of paper it uses it brings from its plant in Canada. It was forced into it by the conditions then surrounding the news-print paper world.

In my judgment, there is no necessity for the calamitous conditions to which the Senator has referred flowing from the passage of this joint resolution, because if it were true that the suppression of news-print paper would be such a calamity to the country—and I confess it would be—then how would it be if, without some agency or some aid, without a combination, the news-print paper people of the United States should say, "We will not sell to the Government, we will not sell to anybody, for less than $5 a hundred pounds at the mill," when we know they can make it for less than 1½ cents a pound?

Mr. SHERMAN. We would be in exactly the same condition if the men holding the patents on the Mergenthaler linotype machine should all unite and say, "We will not sell it; we will quit," or if the manufacturers of printer's ink should do the same thing. Only a limited number of concerns manufacture printer's ink. Every newspaper publishing company that must use ink in vast quantities knows that there is a limited supply of printer's ink. The advance in the price of all these necessities is as great as the advance in the price of print paper.

Mr. HARDING. Much greater.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt, as the Senator from Ohio says, that it is greater, and he is familiar with those matters; I am not. The type founders in Chicago have found the same difficulty in satisfying their customers. Every type founder in the United States has the same conditions confronting him. Type metal has gone up, wages have gone up, rent has gone up, and everything they use in the composition of the type has reached a point where they can no longer sell at prices that do not excite comment on the part of the purchaser.

Print paper, as far as the newspaper world is concerned, would be utterly useless unless we had printer's ink and type founders. Practically in every large daily, unless the linotype could be used, they had just as well suspend publication to-morrow morning. These are all covered by patents. There are only a few men in the United States or in the world who manufacture the Mergenthaler typesetter. No man would think for a moment that those men would stop and destroy the daily newspapers to-morrow morning, and it is inconceivable that the print-paper manufacturers through any act of theirs would destroy the newspaper world, because there is after that no market for most of their product. Self-interest alone would lead them at all times to deliver their product to the consumer at living prices, because that is the only way they can hope themselves to continue in business.

There is much in what the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] says in the possible cessation of the manufacture altogether. It is only by considering the spirit of the resolution that I should think the Government may take over the plant and operate it. A strict adherence literally to the verbiage of the resolution would not justify the inference I have drawn.

That leads us, if I be correct, however, again to the point raised on the ability of the Government to operate under this resolution. Suppose the Government does undertake to operate the plant. It will have to do it with men who know the business. I am aware there are some undertakings of a governmental character where it is possible for the Government to call to its use those who know about the business. But the general rule is to undertake to run a private business by the Government by appointing those who know nothing about it. It has become almost an axiom of Government ownership and operation that a man who understands the business must not be appointed to run it. Some essayist and platform psychologist is called in to make the enterprise go by talking at it.

I do not like to be uncharitable, but it looks to me like much of the governmental activity of the last 10 or 15 years has been devoted to ejecting the men who have spent a lifetime in some occupation from the management of a business, and the search afterwards has been to get somebody to run the same business who does not know anything about it. I heard a man a few days ago say that he had only got help from one man—that all the rest of them gave nothing but advice how to run his business.

So if it be a governmental operation and the print mills are run by the Government, to be taken over under the resolution, what must we expect? We would expect the same activity that we have had on the Shipping Board, for instance. We would expect the same activity that we have had in getting blankets for some camps in northwestern United States; the same activity we have had in getting woolen overcoats. I know most of them have been supplied, but the truth remains that one department I shall not name openly boasted in the city of Washington that it has woolen blankets for men in the service for more than two years, and woolen blankets and woolen overcoats for another department of the United States service are lacking in some of the camps. If they can not distribute pulp paper any better than they can distribute woolen blankets, the Lord deliver us from any more governmental activity until the Government has learned to use what the departments now have without waste and duplication! I give fair and timely warning to the editors who assembled at Minneapolis and passed the resolution, if it is equally deadly among them there will be a good many editors who will lose their places before this is over.

I totally condemn the exercise of any governmental power over individuals or corporations unless it be to regulate them. I believe in a government of regulated individualism, not in the collective ignorance and inexperience of a great multitude, and that is what Government ownership of a private undertaking is in its final analysis. The Government ownership of print-paper pulp will work out like all other Government ownerships. It will produce the usual number of assistants and bureaus and departments and lead to a fresh destruction of shoe leather when we try to find out anything. It will be the same circumlocution office over again.

It is said that the civil service will protect the pay roll. I used to be a victim of that hallucination myself. I confess it with shame. It is just like the universal direct primary, with a ballot the size of a Sunday metropolitan daily. It is a glittering thing when seen in the sky, but it must be worked out under the feet of misguided stargazers of this Republic, and then I sadly confess it is not. Civil service will guide and control every employee in a Government print-paper mill, I presume.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit an interruption there?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is in the shape of a kindly suggestion. While I confess I agree with the Senator on the civil-service business, I would suggest also that on account of so many of the civil-service advocates on his side it might be that in his opposition to the resolution he had better pretermit that part of it for fear that some of them will vote to sustain the civil service in support of the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to their supporting the civil service, but what I object to is to use it as a nostrum that will cover everything, even including a pay roll in a pulp factory. It will not do it. Civil service as administered in this Government to-day is the one colossal humbug of the Western Hemisphere, and everybody knows it. Civil service in the Postal Department is a trap for the unwary. The civil service covers a multitude of sins, all the way from fourth-class postmasters up to the advisers of these departments, their counsel. Some of the lawyers have to go in under civil service, some of the doctors have to pass under the rod of the Civil Service Commission, notwithstanding the lawyers have been licensed and the doctors have been given their license to practice upon helpless communities. It may be manslaughter; I do not know. At any rate the State from which they hail has given them, under general laws, the power to practice their profession. Then the civil service, with solemn unction, assembles itself, through many high-priced examiners, and proceeds to examine for every position in the healing art. They asked a lawyer at one time if he knew what the rule in Shelley's case was. He said he did once years ago, before he ever practiced law, but he said since he learned anything about how law was actually practiced he had forgotten what the rule was.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will excuse me, in the examination for a local carrier on a rural route they asked him how far it was to the moon. He said, "I do not know how far it is exactly, but if it is on my route I do not want this contract." [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of it. That is on an equality with some of the questions asked carriers in my part of the country. I do not want to be led astray from the point under discussion here, but when it is said, and it has been said in private conversation to me, that civil service will come in and cure all these governmental ills, the truth is the civil service was here before the Government ills came. If it is an antidote we ought have remained in sound health. We ought never to have had any occasion for its criticism. The longer the war continues the worse it will grow. When the war is over the most indefatigable chemist in a laboratory could not find, to drop into their parlance, a remote vestige of civil service in all this realm. It will be extinct. It will die a natural death unless somebody reforms the civil-service reformers. War accelerates that as it does with the physically unfit. They get into the service and they have either to get out or die. With many of the governmental undertakings, laws, and institutions all of them that linger for years in peace under the swift surgery of modern warfare will end.

This is only a symptom of the general disease, Mr. President. That is the reason why I am taking the time here to comment on it, not because I have any manufacturers of print paper in my immediate part of the country. We are in a prairie country and we buy from those who manufacture it. I am moved to express myself upon the joint resolution because I regard it as a Government ownership and operation resolution in disguise. I suppose it will be regarded as unwise for me to say that if I must lose my American birthright I would rather lose it by conquest under the helmeted legions of the Kaiser than to lose it from the degradation and decay that comes from the failure of private enterprise.

In this country we have built up our institutions, we have developed our resources, we have hewed and used our forests, we have broken up the sod of our great northwestern plains, we have builded our cities, we have developed our States, we have passed our laws, we have restrained the unruly and criminal, we have made ourselves into great populous empires in the northern Mississippi Valley, taking it from the Canadian border down to the cotton belt. The people of my generation have done this. I can remember to have seen on the unbounded plains the morning sun rise where there was not a house or a fence for a hundred miles. We have seen all of that mighty commonwealth grow to what it is. In that time we have stood aloof from the Government. Outside of buying postage stamps and occasionally being drawn for jury service in the district or circuit court of the United States, we have not known there was such a thing as United States authority. We have built up our enterprises, banking, manufacturing, railways, agriculture, and transportation by inland waterways. We have done all this without a dollar from the Government or a word of encouragement since the Civil War closed.

To-day the Government, as manifested in this resolution, from time to time has been committed to embarking in what are essentially private enterprises, to take away from all these people what they have done, to remove from them what is theirs as a birthright, coming to them from their fathers of old, and committing them to a series of Government undertakings under the guise of war necessity. Great as the emergencies of war are, all human wars have ended. Even the 100 years' war that Holland waged with the Spanish Crown ended. All the battle cries have died away. Some time it will end. We fervently pray the end will speedily come, but if it endure until the last territory of Europe taken in robbery shall be restored, or has been devastated and desolated, or until human exhaustion shall come to the modern world, whether we shall continue the struggle with the posterity of the same armed legions that centuries since destroyed ancient Rome before the Dark Ages were ushered in, it will end at some time and some way.

I have sometimes thought that the present age was somewhat like the days when the Goths and Vandals came down from northern Europe on the civilization of ancient Rome. We do not know with our limited human vision what the end will be. I have seen the luxury of modern life in its development from day to day, from year to year, of great wealth concentrated in cities, the end of that human economy and struggle and simplicity that marked our grandfathers. We have softened our muscles. We abstain from exercise and self-denial. We have lost physical well-being. The automobile has destroyed our ability to walk, and it has taken our appetite with it. We have forgotten half we knew about how to take care of ourselves. It is the age of gasoline and electricity, of class and caste. By pressing a button all human effort by muscle is saved. So we have gone on, staggering beneath a load of self-indulgence, luxuries, until I wonder whether we have reached a condition to-day where Germany and her legions are threatening the civilized world as her ancestors did the ancient Empire of Rome. Time will tell. But we must remember that whatever the end may be, if there is anything left for this Republic it is for the sturdy muscle and mind, the self-reliance of private enterprise, to be permitted to continue on their way. The dreary mediocrity of a socialistic state promises nothing but decay. We can not live in the way and at the gait we are going and sustain ourselves in the great competitive race with the nations of the world.

To my mind, one of the most menacing aspects at present in public affairs is this tendency every time this generation reaches a problem it will not solve itself to run to the Government for help, just like the newspapers are doing now. I wish the editors who founded these great dailies were alive to-day or could be reincarnated and put back upon earth. If their posterity had the same self-reliance that our ancestors had, they would settle this question themselves. But now they reserve a Pullman drawing-room, come to Washington, and ask for help. Every time the price of corn meal goes up in Illinois somebody wires, "See the Government."

Mr. KING. Or if it goes down.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; it is the same way. All the average farmer wants, though, is to be let alone; but as a rule when anything pinches, instead of trying to devise a remedy by individual effort or by working out the salvation at home we come to Washington for help. The States are gradually being destroyed. There are no State powers any more under this administration. Food regulators are going into the kitchens, into the restaurants and hotels. There is not any such thing as private life; it is all the Government.

This is only, I repeat, a symptom of the general disease. I may belong to another age; I do not know nor do I care. I may be a reactionary; I do not know that and I care less. I only know that no Government that has undertaken the unrestrained management of private enterprises has ever strengthened itself or succeeded. It has universally gone the way of taking a growing concern, with its brain and ability and management, and putting it on an unprofitable basis, lowering the rate of the commodity or shortening the hours—and within a reasonable limit I have no objection to raising wages—but taking no account of original cost, no account of depreciation and maintenance, nothing for a sinking fund, going blithely along and living in a financial fool's paradise. All the way from San Francisco to Chicago it is telling the same story. It is sapping individual strength. It is weakening the initiative of the individual, which is the greatest incentive the world ever saw for the development of the Caucasian race. It is creating a staggering debt. It is diminishing the revenues. It is taking away the sources of taxation, because no public property is taxed.

I do not want to take more time; but I repeat, I can not vote for this or any resolution of a similar character. It is only the harbinger of more to come, and I had as well begin on such a question as this as any other. The railroad problem will come in due season. I would rather spend the rest of the life allotted to me in private than to surrender one syllable of my convictions upon these unalterable principles that lie at the basis of civil government. A halt must be called upon the attempt to take in hand the enterprises which are essentially private in character and operate them by the Government. I believe in regulation to the reasonable limit, but I believe in drawing a line of demarcation between what is governmental in character and what is essentially private in character. That, it seems, some of this generation have lost all ability to do. I believe it to be the duty of the Senate to face this issue and manfully, without regard to consequences upon individual Members, to meet the issue that divides what is legitimately a Government undertaking from an essential private undertaking that has belonged to us as an American inheritance.

I have departed somewhat from the exact question involved in the resolution, but it touches the great issue soon to come, and I have done so because of the inevitable tendency of this and all other measures of a like kind.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, it would be impossible for me, and I think for anyone else, to attempt to follow successfully, with any sort of an answer, the very strange mosaic, the beautiful, conglomerate of argument—Government interference with private individuals, the tariff, civil service, the teeth of the children in Chicago, automobiles, leather, powers of the State, taxation, railroads. These are only a few of the very important questions touched on very entertainingly by the Senator from Illinois, and even if the conclusions reached as to many of the positions he has taken be true, none of them, as far as I can see, have anything to do with the consideration of this measure further than the mere naked question as to the wisdom of the Government proceeding under the provisions of the joint resolution.

With the ingenuity of a practiced debater, however, the Senator from Illinois has very well appealed to every prejudice that ever man had in peace times against any interference by the Government with any functions of private life or the private business of people. In that sentiment we all agree, but let us get out of the clouds and the mist of these Niagara Falls noises and see if we can not come down to a condition that now confronts us.

The Senator from Illinois speaks always entertainingly, and we listen to him with pleasure, but did you notice that he has not offered a single suggestion? My friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is equally prolific in denunciation, but he can not find one word to put in its place. It is like what the old preacher once said when he heard an infidel. He said:

> How pitiable it is to see men attempting to tear down the things which so many think are right and on which so much of hope and belief depends and yet offering not one thing in place of the superstructure which they are attacking.

So it is in this case. We have nothing but a denunciation of every single war measure which has been taken since the war began. There is not an argument which has been made here against this measure which is not equally applicable to the food law and to every other war measure which has been passed by Congress, and, boiled down to its lowest terms, you find in the very argument that has been used by the Senator from Illinois—while I do not claim that the Senator was attempting in any manner to stand in the way of the successful prosecution of the war—I say in the application of his argument, his position may be used against every war measure which has been passed by Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the Senator specify what I or any of my colleagues who have opposed this joint resolution have said to justify opposition to legitimate war measures.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have said that I can take the generalizations of the Senator's statements and apply them to the food law, for in the food law there is the very provision to which he is objecting in this joint resolution. He may make a differentiation that the food law presented a very different matter from that contained in this print-paper joint resolution; and that is what I want to get at right now. I want to disclaim now, though there is no need for the disclaimer in the light of the record of my friend from Illinois, that he and the Republican Party are not entitled to credit, just as I am, for standing behind the people of the United States in every just means to prosecute this war to a successful termination. I want to say that no act of the Senator's which I have ever known has intentionally militated against that result.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator from Arizona if all the arguments opposed to this joint resolution have not been to limit the Government to what is strictly necessary, and not to go outside to take up any private enterprise which is not urgently demanded by the exigencies of war? That is our argument.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, that is your argument, as stated, but the argument goes further, in effect, against this particular joint resolution by your denial of the fact that it is in any sense necessary for the Government to take hold of this matter at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a further inquiry?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Government of the United States expect to fight the Germans with paper wads made out of pulp or with leaden bullets? What has paper got to do with the war? All of the war news is censored out of the papers. We do not get any news. Every correspondent is bursting with suppressed information which he dares not publish.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have no idea that all the newspapers are half so pregnant with valuable information as is my friend himself, who suppresses the knowledge of the things he has; and if he thought it would militate against America, against our successful enterprise, he would not give it, no matter how strongly the pains of parturition might oppress him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, might I then inquire what is the vital necessity of paper pulp or print paper in the war if we do not get any news?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will answer the Senator with pleasure. In order to get paper you must have pulp. You can not print a paper in the United States without chemical or mechanical pulp. That is essential to the industry of printing. You could not run this country, and you could not have floated your war loans if the action of the court in this particular case had not been taken, removing, as I said yesterday, the strangle hold of this trust from the throats of the publishers of the United States.

As to the talk about the censorship of the press, I desire to say that there is not a reputable newspaper, except the large ones of which the Senator speaks, that looking between the lines and speaking only from a very just suspicion, that has said nothing on this subject, that has not contracts which are far better than the ordinary paper gets from these print-paper manufacturers.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Arizona explain to the Senate how this joint resolution will help the progress of the war? I have been waiting to hear as to that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will tell the Senator. This joint resolution may not help the progress of the war; it may not retard an enemy shot on the battle field or save a drop of blood in France, in Belgium, in Russia, or in Italy; but it may save many a drop of blood of some poor typesetters in every little country town in Illinois who have been robbed, whose lives have been made a burden, and their homes made unhappy under all this taxation which we are enduring for the purposes of war. Take this combination of news paper manufacturers; they form themselves into a trust, and through the instrumentality of their own illegal conduct they have compelled every single country newspaper in my State and in yours to buy paper at a price not justified either by conscience or by common decency.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator from Arizona will allow me, as I happen to be a newspaper publisher myself, I am extremely interested to know how this reaches the typesetter?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It will reach the typesetter if he is put out of business, will it not? I should not think it would be hard for the Senator from Ohio to draw the conclusion that, if you drive the typesetter out of business and send him on the street as a tramp, it might be that he would be a little worse off than he was before. Will they keep him on the newspaper with these constantly increasing prices?

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator allow another question?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator know of any newspaper publication having been discontinued because of the price of paper?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know of any such publication which has been discontinued because of the price of paper, except, as the Senator will see himself, by looking at the report of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. HARDING. Then, another question. Does the Senator know that news-print paper generally was much cheaper in January, 1917, than it was, for instance, in December or January, 1916?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is not a doubt about it, and I am delighted that the Senator has called my attention to it. The very men against whom I am inveighing did not get in their "fine Italian hand" until the time of which the Senator speaks, until they were indicted, and only escaped the penitentiary by confessing to absolute crimes against common business decency as well as against the law of this country. Until that minute they held the strangle hold. I will tell the Senator about that. As soon as they were convicted, and as soon as the Federal Trade Commission made its report, they commenced letting go; they commenced selling news-print paper cheaper, and the only independent concern to-day is furnishing paper to the trade everywhere at 2½ cents. They agreed to give it for 3 cents until the 1st of April, and then at whatever price the Trade Commission might fix; but the ink was not dry on that agreement, the record had hardly been signed by the judge, before we find these people, as appears in the Paper Trade Journal, in the forty-sixth year of its publication, declaring:

It is held in this connection that now more than ever before is the time for news paper manufacturers to stand close together and obtain unified action.

Just exactly the unified action that they had when they were charging from 4½ cents up as high as 9 cents a pound for common print paper, which they were making for a cent and a half a pound.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will yield to the Senator from Illinois with pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. If any typesetters in the western country have lost their occupation, I know of no place than there where they can more quickly find something else to do. The potato patch is still untenanted in that country; the corn is still unhusked; the stock is still unfed; the great granary of the world in this crisis is without the garnerer of the sheaves or of the planter in the spring to come; and no human being with ordinary understanding and a fair pair of legs, Mr. President, can fail to get a job in the mighty West.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is very true.

Mr. SHERMAN. No typesetter need be out of work, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator is not confining himself strictly to the discussion, but I do not object to that, for the Senator is always at least illuminating in the suggestions he makes. Now, however, he is dodging the question of this combine, which controls 90 per cent of the print paper in America and one-third of that which is sent from Canada, which is being sold to Americans for 3 cents and to Canadians for 1½ cents a pound, with no duty. These manufacturers infamously and impertinently claim that they are being compelled to compete with a similar commodity imported free of duty. If a duty were added, I do not know what the effect would be; for a part of the argument of my friend demonstrated to me beyond question that the best possible way to secure high prices for American products was to give free trade. He showed that by his argument.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let me state my position in this case. I shall not be led into further argument in reference to matters outside. Here are the conditions which constrain the Senate of the United States, on an appeal from the publishers of this country, to take action. There was a combination in restrain of trade on an article which was very important to the United States itself; that is, print paper. I presume no man will gainsay that in this hour of civilization, and certainly it will not be gainsaid by one who for so many years gave out from his sanctum, through the instrumentality of his own press, the enlightenment which every once in a while made Ohio democratic.

But, Mr. President, there has not been a suggestion as to how the country is to get rid of this condition; no man has dared suggest an amendment that will take care of it; but, on the contrary, Senators have merely declaimed against the Government taking hold of anything.

Here were the conditions, as I said yesterday, and when I conclude this I shall say no more. The record shows that about 85 or 95 per cent of the print-paper manufacturers in the United States formed a combination. They were not working closely enough together. They called in an attorney, who told them they could not evade the law by forming a mere corporation, and there was no sense in doing that. So they formed an association without articles of incorporation, and they appointed a board of five directors, with a sort of director general. The very first thing they did when they got well consolidated, as the record shows, was to notify every user of paper in the country, when there was not one iota of evidence, that it cost 20 cents more a hundred tons to produce paper at the time they took the action than it cost six months before; that the cost of production had so enormously increased that they would have to increase the price. The grand mogul of the crowd wrote to the different manufacturers requesting that they send him a statement of their costs and to make those costs as extreme and as high as they could in order to justify an increase in the price of the product to the consumer.

Senators, if the newspapers of the United States are not essential to the prosecution of the war, there is nothing on earth that is. You can strike down the newspapers to-day, but the result would be disastrous. Senators talk about invading private rights. Suppose, on the other hand, by the outrageous proceedings or measures that I have suggested as being taken on the part of the paper manufacturers, the newspapers should be blotted out, and suppose in every country home to-morrow there could not be read news of what the Government is doing, how long would it take to float another liberty loan? Under such conditions, how long would it have taken to float the last liberty loan? The newspapers of this country, in spite of the criticisms that have been made of their selfishness, as we all know, are the bulwark of American power and force in the creation of an enlightened and patriotic public sentiment.

It is easy to decry an argument of this kind and say it has nothing to do with the question and in the meantime permit these robbers to flock like vultures at the corpses of those whom they are despoiling in order to make profit. They put in their own pockets in one year a profit of $17,000,000 wrung from the people, without earning it in the least degree; and in their last report, in spite of some of the complaints of these gentlemen as to the increased cost of living and production, they say that they paid above all expenses, including war taxes and 15 per cent depreciation on their mills, a modest little dividend of 29 per cent.

Senators, I ask, What is to be done? It is well enough to inveigh against the Government taking private property into its hands; but the newspaper press of this country is as essential as is the soldier. The newspaper is the most potent factor in keeping up the esprit de corps of our people. Yet, it is said, let the newspapers be taxed all that the print-paper manufacturers please, we must not dare let the Government put its sacrilegious hand on those who have gotten together in the attempt to rob everyone who uses their product.

It is said the Government has no power to act, but no other remedy is offered; no single remedial amendment is proposed. There is merely a general denunciation of the pending proposal and the statement that the Government has no right to take over the property of private individuals.

When I opened the debate on this question yesterday I said then all I intended to say, and but for the remarks of the Senator from Illinois this evening I would have said no more. I regret even that I have said now what I have said, for I am anxious to get a vote on this measure. But, Mr. President, let us not, under the guise of protecting the rights of the individual to his own development, because of the appeal to that beautiful vision of the American conquering the West and the glorious story of America's useful achievements, be led away from the issue. America will show in this modern day still greater achievements if we can make people deal fairly with each other. That is all this joint resolution proposes. Every suggestion that it provides for Government control, every suggestion that it proposes Government ownership, is absolutely outside of the facts. It merely proposes to tell these manufacturers that if they do not distribute their products fairly the Government will distribute them; that they shall not do as they have been doing and as their new combination will probably do—give to my friend, the great Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] 20 tons of paper and give to my equally distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] not a ton. That is the reason why the provision in regard to distribution comes in. These manufacturers do not care whether they sell to one man or another if they get their money, but their contracts do not allow a resale. One newspaper could get 20 tons of paper from them, but under its contract with them it could not let a neighboring paper have half a ton of it; it would be itself required to use every bit of it. That provision is in their written contracts, of which I have a copy. That practice, the decision of the court says, they shall not pursue further.

I suggest that Senators read the decision in that case. If they will do so, they will learn something about the print-paper business as it is conducted by its present owners, which, it is said, we are going to invade, although it is simply proposed to grant such power as will make them quit robbing the public; that is all. We do not want to take possession of their plants; we do not want to do a thing to them but what we have done in every other case, and what we will probably have to do to a still greater extent before the war is over.

In a time of profound peace nobody, as I suggested in opening this debate, would for one moment contend that some of the measures proposed come within the legitimate functions of the Government; there are in time of peace other ways to handle such situations. That is true of the food bill, and it is true of every war bill we have passed; they were not within the legitimate functions of the Government in time of peace; but this is not a time of peace; this is a time of war—a war straining every energy—and I say, without meaning to denounce anybody, that my own private judgment is that the men or the set of men who take advantage of this unhappy condition of our suffering country to line their own pockets with money, only to flaunt themselves around in the face of the want and need of their neighbors, are deserving of the severest condemnation. They do not need the money, and they have no right to take it.

On the hands of the Government in time of war there is very little restraint. As much as my friend reveres the Constitution, he has studied it no more and worshipped at its shrine no longer than I; but if that Constitution is to nerve the arm of this country when fighting for its very existence, are we to permit adherence to its strictest terms alone to guide us while the Germans are killing men, women, and children in every country which they have invaded, as they soon may invade ours? Are we to indulge in namby-pamby talk about the restrictions and limitations of the Constitution when the Government needs something to preserve its very life? When the Government requires something for its existence, it can take it. It could take over the newspapers if it wanted them to send forth news to the world and there was no other way of doing it. That is the reason I contend that all this argument amounts to nothing in the light of the facts which are of record that 7½ cents was the price offered to the Government for paper a year ago, while the paper manufacturers have agreed now to supply the paper for 3 cents a pound, an independent company is supplying it for 2½ cents a pound, and there is not one of the paper companies that can not make paper at 1 cent a pound.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. GALLINGER. At 1 cent?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. At 1½ cents, to a certainty.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely want to ask the Senator a question. The Senator bitterly criticizes the paper manufacturers of the country as profiteers, and says they ought to be put in jail. That ought to apply, then, to all the manufacturers of the country, ought it not, who may be said to be in the same situation?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Unquestionably; as to those engaged in producing a material that is necessary; though it might not apply to concerns engaged in furnishing fox and skunk hides.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I meant—materials necessary for use by the people.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I will ask the Senator, why he does not include in this joint resolution manufacturers of cotton goods? Mrs. Smoot went down town the other day to buy a piece of cotton cloth, which three years ago she could buy for 10 cents a yard, but she was compelled to pay 35 cents for it. That is a 350 per cent increase. There has been no such increase in the price of print paper.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If I should——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But the Senator is not asking me a question.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am asking a question; and I am going to conclude it in a moment. The news-print paper manufacturers charged 2 cents a pound for their paper before the war, while now they are charging from 2½ to 3 cents a pound. That is an increase of from 25 to 50 per cent, whereas the price of cloth made from cotton has increased 350 per cent. Why do we not regulate that business?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator says——

Mr. SMOOT. Because——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Oh, I give up.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not blame the Senator for giving up.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should not think the Senator would; he takes my time and will not let me get the floor again.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, the Senator can answer the question now.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will try to answer it in this way: Will the Senator consent to a reduction, to the same extent, in the price of woolen blankets made in Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly I will.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is so much a yard?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, blankets are not sold by the yard.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Well, so much on the pound.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Do not quibble on how they are sold. You are getting a bigger profit or as big a profit on woolen goods as is being obtained on cotton goods. There is no use in trying to becloud this question. Why does not the Senator ask me something about the scarcity of parsnips in Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to have the law apply to every class of manufactures in the United States and not merely to one class. I am not going to stand here and try to point out that the print-paper manufacturers are profiteers when there are other industries in the United States that are making from 300 to 400 per cent more profit out of the goods which they produce than are the paper manufacturers.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Inasmuch as the Senator has injected another speech, I should like to make an observation in my own time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make an inquiry relative to the ground covered just a moment ago by the Senator. Why have these robbers not been indicted?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They have been convicted and would have gone to the penitentiary except for an agreement that was arrived at.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why not keep on convicting them, so that it will be so unprofitable that these robberies will cease? I inquire why existing law has not been applied and applied sufficiently to correct any evil?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will tell the Senator a little about that, since the Senator calls it up. I am again obliged to the Senator. He will get enough enlightenment now, if he will listen, to change his ideas about this measure. These gentlemen got together when an investigation of them was commenced and in order to avoid it they went before the Trade Commission and agreed with the Trade Commission to fix a price of 2½ cents a pound for print paper, not claiming, as they themselves said, that there had been any unreasonable increase in the cost of manufacture. Then they attempted to get the Attorney General's Office to agree that if they would produce paper at 2½ cents a pound there would be no indictment brought against them under the antitrust law. However, he did bring that indictment. Those gentlemen appeared before us, and immediately on the finding of the indictment and the equity suit to do away with this corporation they increased the price to 3 cents in less than a week. What for? It certainly was not out of revenge, was it? Were they giving it to the Government at a price at which they were going to lose money? As soon as the Government began to indict them they said, "Well, we will increase it to 3 cents.

They were indicted. Look at the remarks I submitted yesterday, which appear in the RECORD. I put the indictment in the speech.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; I have seen it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They entered what you and I and all lawyers know, that ingenious plea that "I will not answer; I will not contend." In spite of the fact that the indictment laid down seven or eight of the most awful violations of the Sherman antitrust law in the history of this country, they would not contend. They agreed to it in the processes of that settlement, in consideration of the fact that the Government would not press the question of conviction.

I am glad the Senator is back, for I may have gone too far in the statement I made, to which I see he is about to make some interruption.

As soon as they were indicted they came before the tribunal on the 17th, I think, of last November. There they confessed, as you and I and every lawyer knows, that "We will not contend against these facts. We will confess that we have been in this conspiracy," and here is what we did: We agreed to fine them $2,500 apiece and remit any further prosecution on that account. They agreed that they would sell news-print paper now not at the 2½ cents to which they had agreed but at 3 cents up to the 1st of April, in carload lots, roll paper, f. o. b. at the mill. That did not touch the greatest part of the iniquities that they had been practicing; but let that go. They agreed to that, and agreed further—these five men, running five of those big companies—after the 1st day of April to submit to the very things as to which you are contending, and all the balance of you, how outrageous it would be; and those men themselves consented that this matter should be thereafter settled at the price stated by the Federal Trade Commission.

They have been given six months. They only met here yesterday—a matter to which the Senator from New Hampshire called my attention, and which I investigated last night. They were not ready. Six months was not nearly enough time. In spite of their statements prior to this that the products going into the manufacture of paper have not seriously increased in price, they now want until the 4th of February to ascertain what their property is worth.

If that is not fraud, what is it? They are making every day accounts to their own people, and they are writing off every year 15 per cent depreciation on the wear and tear of their machinery, and yet, while they have had six months, they want three months more, until the 4th of next February, to make a showing as to what their property is worth and what it costs them to make paper. You know and I know and every other man knows that those great business concerns know to the fraction of an ounce what a ton of paper costs them. They know.

If that were all there were in it, there might be nothing left in the bill; but under these agreements that they have made any one of them can still make a trade with a publisher for the small cut paper going to the country press at any prices they please. They ought to be allowed 10 per cent for handling it; the mill ought to be allowed a fair profit for making it; and that is the whole purpose of this resolution, and the whole purpose of the Trade Commission and every man on it, and the whole purpose of these thousands, yes, thousands of editors of some of the biggest papers in the country, answering completely the Senator's argument as to censorship of the press. They have asked for this action in paper after paper. I have here on my desk two different publications that are absolutely filled with the names of the papers and the localities where the men live asking for relief from this aggression; and yet, my Lord! we stand here asking what paper has to do with the war! We lose sight of the inadvisability, in an emergency like this, of allowing the crippling of this great arm of the Government that is suffering in its support, but is none the less devoted to it, the great country press of this country that has assisted so materialy in floating our liberty bonds. We stand by, for fear of interfering with legitimate business, and let this sort of a combination keep up, and keep up eternally!

Better a thousand times a censorship of the Government against every paper that did not say exactly what it pleased, as infamous as that would be, a thousand times better than to let a combination of self-seeking gentlemen get together and say, "We will rob every poor editor, every poor paper, and increase the price in spite of the great tax they are already paying in their postage. We will increase the price to these people and fill our own pockets still fuller."

Mr. President, unless some other Senator desires to speak, I would just as soon move that the Senate adjourn at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator would better make that motion. Quite a number of Senators on this side of the Chamber intend to speak on the resolution, but they are not prepared to do so to-day. I think this is a good time to adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection, unless there is some reason to have an executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; there is not.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I know of no reason for an executive session. There has been some suggestion for the Senate not to sit to-morrow; but in explanation of a motion to adjourn until to-morrow I will say that, among other things, the conference report on the farm-loan bank bill will be taken up to-morrow, and more particularly I want to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] desires to submit some remarks to the Senate to-morrow. I take it that he will have something to say about his recent trip to the battle front in France, though he did not tell me the subject to which he expected to address himself; but he did say that if it would be agreeable he would like to address the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think that could easily be accomplished before the expiration of the morning hour, and I would willingly join in the request that the Senator should have that right. I would not if I could stand in the way of the delivery of his speech.

Mr. MARTIN. I will say that I do not know that the Senator from Iowa would want to interfere with any other business. He just happened to mention to me the fact that he wished to address the Senate to-morrow, if it would be agreeable to the Senate to hear him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was only going to make this suggestion: We have been in the habit recently, when a bill came here, of being told that it must be put through instantly, almost the very day it has been reported; and we have yielded to that because it was said that it was a crisis in our affairs. Now, this bill need not be hurried. If the Senator gets his bill through in three or four days he will be doing remarkably well. I had a bill here, relating to something that concerned me much more deeply than this concerns the Senator, and I did not get it through for three months.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator remembers well when he was one of the few that helped me try to get a bill through for over 20 years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I did, and we succeeded after a while.

What I was about to remark was that I think the Senator would better let the consideration of this measure go along deliberately. There are several Senators who desire to speak. Some of them are not prepared to speak to-day, and they may not be to-morrow, but I feel sure that the Senator will get a vote on this bill in a few days. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator. The only fear I have about it is that matters of greater importance, in the view of the Senate, will probably be intruded, and the bill will go over for weeks and weeks at a time.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is nothing in sight.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Whatever I have asked about the consideration of the bill, I confess has been largely personal. I would not permit that to prevent the proper consideration of the bill and whatever debate on it Senators really want to make; but I am extremely anxious, largely on personal grounds, to see that it is not displaced as the unfinished business.

Mr. GALLINGER. We will try not to allow that to happen.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If that is not done, I am perfectly willing that it shall go over until to-morrow as the unfinished business.

Mr. MARTIN. It will, under the rules, take that course if the Senate adjourns. Therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 10, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 9, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the clear and cogent messages delivered by the Premier of Great Britain and the President of the United States as to the demands of the entente powers, their position, and desires for a world-wide peace, based on clear and God-like principles, for all the world. And we pray that these just and equitable principles may find a response in every true heart and become the basis of a world-wide conference among the leaders of all nations; that the terrible war may cease, and liberty, truth, justice, and righteousness be established in all the world, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3009. An act granting the consent of Congress to the P. M. C. Coal Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Pike County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3081. An act to extend the time for the completion of the municipal bridge approaches, and extensions or additions thereto, by the city of St. Louis within the States of Illinois and Missouri; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2812. An act to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION AMENDMENT.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, on August 1, 1917, the Senate passed the amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for nation-wide prohibition by a vote of 65 to 20. In the House, on December 17, 1917, the House passed the resolution by a vote of 282 to 128. The legislature of my State yesterday convened at 12 o'clock, and in the lower house of that body, by a vote of 93 to 3, it ratified the constitutional prohibition amendment. [Applause.] The senate of that State on yesterday by a vote of 28 to 5 took like action. [Applause.] Thus Mississippi is the first State to ratify the constitutional prohibition amendment, and it is hoped that the action of that body, in a State that has seen the beneficent influence of prohibition for many years, will be followed by other States of the Union. [Applause.]

SERVICE FLAG IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives secure from the Members of the House of Representatives the record of the number of sons or brothers of Members in the military or naval service of the United States, and that he is instructed to procure a suitable service flag representing this number, or such number as may later join the colors, to be hung in the Hall of the House of Representatives, and that credit on the flag shall also be given for the four Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress who have joined the colors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GORDON. I object, Mr. Speaker. I did not hear the resolution read. I will object to its consideration.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution be read again for the benefit of the gentleman.

Mr. GORDON. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the resolution be read again. Is there objection to that?

There was no objection.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts on what theory brothers of Members are included?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I thought that there were Members of the House probably not old enough to have sons in the service, but who are greatly interested in the fact that they have younger brothers or older brothers who have joined the colors.

Mr. LENROOT. Generally, where service flags are used by members of families, brothers are not included.

Mr. TREADWAY. My understanding, Mr. Speaker, is that the use of the service flag is pretty general. Organizations use them, and they are used to designate members of a family or members of a church. It has been very general, and I think properly so. It strikes me that the relationship of brothers and sons is sufficiently close to recognize them in a flag of this character.

Mr. LENROOT. My understanding was that service flags only included the members of the immediate family, and it seems to me that if brothers are to be included the force and significance of the service flag would largely be lost.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; unless the brothers were members of the family or the same household. I really think it would lessen the effect of it if it includes brothers in the form in which it is stated.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by some of the Members I ask unanimous consent that the word "brothers" may be stricken out.

Mr. CANNON. What are you going to do—if the gentleman will yield—about those Representatives who have no sons or brothers?

Mr. MADDEN. They may have sons-in-law.

Mr. CANNON. Some have no sons-in-law.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. GARD. What is the plan of the War Department or of the Navy Department as to the use of the service flag?

Mr. TREADWAY. My only knowledge on that score is that gained from the service flag at the entrance of the War Department, showing the number of employees of the department that are now with the colors—a very large flag, as the gentleman probably knows.

Mr. GARD. Has there been any general rule adopted with regard to the service flag?

Mr. TREADWAY. Not to my knowledge, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a matter upon which some of us have had no thought before. It occurs to me that the gentleman ought to consider very carefully just who should be represented. I really have some question as to whether a service flag hung in the Hall of the House of Representatives should contain stars indicating other than Members of the House of Representatives and probably employees of the House of Representatives who have gone, and that it ought not to go to the extent of including members of families. Those are represented in the homes of Members by the service flags there. I suggest that to the gentleman's consideration. With the spirit and purpose which the gentleman has in mind, of course, I am sure we are all in harmony, but I venture to suggest to the gentleman that he withdraw the resolution for the present.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am willing to leave it temporarily.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Leave it temporarily, and let us discuss that a little and see just what form it should take.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be allowed to lie on the table temporarily, to be brought up later.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. MOON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] objects.

Mr. TREADWAY. What is the nature of the objection?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts requested that his resolution lie on the table temporarily, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] objected. The gentleman from Massachusetts can withdraw his resolution without asking anybody's consent.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is entirely agreeable to me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it ought to be considered by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to suggest to my colleague from Massachusetts that, as I understand it, there is now no officially recognized service flag. There happens to be pending before this House, as I understand it, a resolution or bill, introduced by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], to have Congress provide a design for a service flag, and I would suggest that, rather than have the resolution referred to the Military Affairs Committee, my colleague from Massachusetts withdraw it until action is had upon the resolution of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to call the attention of the House for just a moment to the situation with reference to this service flag. The service flag that is in general use throughout the Nation has been patented by an Army officer, Capt. R. L. Queisser, of Cleveland, Ohio, who is charging for the use of this flag a royalty of 5 and 10 per cent of the wholesale price. This Army officer has pretended to assign this patent to what is known as the Service Flag Co., of Cleveland, Ohio. The stationery of that company has but one name on it, and that is the name of the president, who, by the way, is the officer who patented the flag. It is merely a pretended assignment for the reason that the patentee and the company are one and the same person. I think there should be something in our connection with this war so altogether worthy that the profiteer should be made to keep his hands off of it. [Applause.] The mothers of America are hanging this flag in their windows as a sort of holy sacrament, as an expression of the pride that they feel in contributing a son to the service of the Republic. That anyone, especially an Army officer, should exact from them a royalty is nothing short of contemptible. I have pending before the Judiciary Committee a resolution calling for the adoption of a service flag which shall be known as the national service flag, upon which no patent shall be granted. I would not like to see this House indicate its pride in the Members who have gone to the service by hanging any flag upon these walls upon which we have to pay a royalty before we may use it. [Applause.] I would like to see this resolution withdrawn until the Judiciary Committee can report in proper form some legislation, either by resolution or such amendment as may suit its pleasure, looking to the adoption of some design as a national service flag which the homes of America may use without charge, because I am tired of seeing the devotion and the patriotism of the parents of this Nation coined into money for the benefit of the profiteer. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has offered a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes, to give some information that may be of value to the House concerning the patent upon this flag.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] moves that this resolution be referred to the Military Affairs Committee. How much time does the gentleman from Wisconsin ask for?

Mr. STAFFORD. Three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, last November my attention was called to the fact that this captain in the Army to whom the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] refers, and who has been given considerable prominence in this House by a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] to provide $50,000 for the purchase of this service design to be displayed in the homes of families whose sons have enlisted under the colors, had begun proceedings against manufacturers of these generally used service flags. I received the information from a patent attorney who was representing some of these manufacturers who had manufactured flags without authority from the inventor of the design. He advised me that the head of the division of designs in the Patent Office had made a finding adverse to the granting of the patent for the design, but that in his absence on a vacation some subordinate or other official had authorized the patent. This patent attorney is contesting the position of this Army officer who is claiming 5 per cent royalty on all flags manufactured before the issuance of the design patent, and 10 per cent royalty, 5 per cent for himself and 5 per cent for the Red Cross, on all flags manufactured thereafter. It is a question that is going to be contested, because many manufacturers are being besieged with claims by this person who has obtained this design patent really with the disapproval of the head of the Design Division that had it in charge.

True, he has a patent; but I approve the position taken by the gentleman from Nebraska that we should not go ahead and grant authorization by congressional action of a design which the claimed originator is using for collecting money from innocent users.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the motion so as to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, that already has the other resolution.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it should go to the Committee in the Judiciary. The matter that the gentleman from Nebraska has before him is the general proposition, and this is a special one relative solely to this organization. As far as I am concerned, I should be perfectly willing to have it await in the Committee on Military Affairs until action is taken in the Judiciary Committee on the gentleman's previous resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. My point of order is that permission has not been secured to consider the resolution, and therefore the motion to refer it is not in order.

Mr. TREADWAY. The question was put by the Speaker as to whether there was objection, and there was none.

Mr. GARD. Would not it solve all the difficulty if the gentleman from Massachusetts would withdraw the resolution?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, we have already taken too much time on a matter that I thought would not take any time, and I withdraw the resolution for the present.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 106. Joint resolution extending until January 1, 1919, the effective date of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Woman Suffrage may file minority views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to file minority views on the woman suffrage resolution. In what time?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Instanter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to file minority views on the woman suffrage resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAIRS.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement by one of the pair clerks of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement from one of the pair clerks of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take occasion to state that the House has absolutely nothing to do with pairs. It has gone as far as to allow them to be made a matter of record, but it is a private transaction. A good many Members think that the House has something to do with it, but it has not. If anybody wishes to know all about pairs, let him get Benton's "Thirty Years in the United States Senate" and see what he had to say about it when it was first begun.

The statement is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1918.

Messrs. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C., and T. A. CHANDLER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIRS: On day before yesterday you requested me, as pair clerk of the House of Representatives, to make you a statement in writing as to the facts concerning the pair made between you and Hon. JAMES C. WILSON, giving the reason why the pair was not observed and did not appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

About two weeks before the vote was taken on the constitutional amendment for national prohibition, Hon. THOMAS BLANTON, Member of Congress from the sixteenth Texas district, came to me and stated that he had a pair upon the votes to be taken upon the constitutional questions of national prohibition and woman suffrage, Mr. BLANTON stating that he was for both these propositions and that Mr. WILSON would be against both, and that they would secure some other Member who would vote as Mr. BLANTON would in the matter. (Pairs upon these constitutional questions are in the same proportion as the vote, and as it requires a two-thirds majority for legislation of this character, it would take two Members for either of these amendments to protect one Member voting against.) On the next day Mr. BLANTON came to me with Mr. T. A. CHANDLER, Member of Congress from Oklahoma, and handed to me a pair which was out of the ordinary for the reason that it was a typewritten agreement, with the names of Messrs. BLANTON and CHANDLER voting for the prohibition amendment and Mr. WILSON voting against the prohibition amendment inserted in the pair and duly signed by each of them, and I told them, as pair clerk, that the pair would go into the RECORD.

Two or three days before the vote was taken on the prohibition amendment Mr. WILSON came to me and said he had expected to leave the city, but that as he had not he desired to have the pair changed to some one else who would vote as he would in order that he might vote.

Now, pairs are simply agreements between Members of Congress, the idea being that one vote will offset the other, and should one or all Members concerned in a pair or an agreement made between Members be absent, these agreements and pairs are observed. After such an agreement is made it is never altered by the pair clerks, except by the consent or permission of those concerned.

Therefore, when Mr. WILSON requested the pair clerks to release him we had nothing to do with it, as the matter was between Messrs. BLANTON of Texas, CHANDLER of Oklahoma, and Mr. WILSON of Texas. I told Mr. WILSON that if he would communicate with Messrs. BLANTON and CHANDLER, and they would agree to do so, of course it would be all right; otherwise I would put the pair up for the RECORD.

In the meantime Hon CLAUDE KITCHIN, the Democratic floor leader, handed me a telegram from Mr. BLANTON, which is as follows:

"Am making three speeches a day in my district, embracing 58 counties, in effort to wipe out all disloyalty and force absolute support behind Government. If WILSON of Texas will support prohibition amendment, then change my pair to benefit cause, or if necessary I will return immediately."

Mr. WILSON came back to see me and said so far as Mr. BLANTON was concerned he was willing to release him (Mr. WILSON) from the pair. Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH, who represents the minority in the matter of pairs, who was present, asked Mr. WILSON how he expected to protect Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. WILSON said that he had no agreement with Mr. CHANDLER, and then we cited Mr. WILSON to the signed agreement, with all names filled in, and which is as follows:

"Mr. Speaker: We, the undersigned, have paired on the resolutions for the national prohibition amendment and the national woman suffrage amendment, THOMAS L. BLANTON, of Texas, and T. A. CHANDLER, of Oklahoma, each voting both for national prohibition and national woman suffrage and JAMES C. WILSON, of Texas, voting against both of these said resolutions, and we request that this agreement be printed in the RECORD.

(Signed) "THOMAS L. BLANTON, of Texas.
"T. A. CHANDLER, of Ohio.
"JAMES C. WILSON." (Name later erased.)

Mr. WILSON then said that he intended to vote anyway. I went to Mr. FERRIS, of Oklahoma, and although it was late we made an effort to communicate with Mr. CHANDLER as to whether he wanted to hold

Mr. WILSON to the pair, as it was my plain duty as pair clerk to have the pair as made announced for printing in the RECORD. Mr. WILSON came to the pair clerk's desk again, and with him was Mr. MORGAN, of Oklahoma, who stated that he was not willing to state whether or not Mr. CHANDLER would be willing to release Mr. WILSON from the pair, after the matter had been explained to him. Mr. WILSON then left and returned after a few minutes and said that he was going to vote and asked to see the signed pair, which he took and said as he intended to vote, would not have his name on it, and then erased his name from the agreement, which he had, according to his own statement, signed.

Mr. BLANTON's telegram released Mr. WILSON from the pair, provided he intended to vote for the prohibition amendment, and on the final vote he voted against the amendment, so that he had no release from Mr. BLANTON and did not claim to have any from Mr. CHANDLER. We, the pair clerks, could not put the pair into the RECORD because Mr. WILSON had erased his name and there was nothing to hold him to the agreement, as he had announced his intention of voting.

This is how the matter happened, and no one regrets as much as do the pair clerks that you both were left unprotected on the vote, as we knew when you left the city it was with the understanding that you would be taken care of.

With highest personal regard, I am,

Very respectfully, yours, W. E. SMALL, Jr.,

Pair Clerk, House of Representatives.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech made by my colleague from New York [Mr. HICKS] on his observations on the battle front in Europe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] on his observations on the battle front in Europe. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] is ill, and I ask unanimous consent that he be excused for 10 days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the leave of absence for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] for 10 days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take occasion to state that in such cases as this if the Member will give the Clerk a slip making the request they can all be attended to at once without waste of time. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the first committee.

FUEL STORAGE YARD IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees, and when the Committee on Mines and Mining was reached.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution 23, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to make an investigation and report upon the advisability of establishing and maintaining Government fuel yard or yards in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 23.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be prepared by the Director of the Bureau of Mines plans and specifications, together with report showing the approximate cost of the establishment of a fuel-storage yard or yards and necessary handling and distributing equipment in the District of Columbia, for the storage of fuel for the use of and for delivery to all executive departments and independent establishments in the District of Columbia and vicinity, which plans and specifications and estimates of cost, together with a report upon the advisability of establishing, maintaining, and operating such a yard or yards and equipment, and the feasibility of consolidating all matters relating to the purchase and supply of fuel for the use of the Federal Government in the District of Columbia and vicinity, shall be submitted to Congress on the first Monday in December, 1917, or as soon thereafter as practicable.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is for the purpose of directing the Bureau of Mines and Mining to prepare plans and select a location for the establishment of a Government fuel yard in the District of Columbia to supply the executive departments and independent establishments within the District of Columbia, and those within the vicinity of the District of Columbia. I do not recall how many there are but the workhouse at Occoquan is outside and the fuel is supplied to it by the Government.

Last summer one department of the Government secured its own coal, buying some 15,000 tons, securing a truck for the purpose of delivering it, and secured its coal for 76 cents less a ton than it could have been bought from the dealers or by bids. There is used, or was previous to the war, about 225,000 tons per year, so at this rate in normal times the saving in the cost of coal for the District of Columbia for Government use would amount to quite a considerable sum of money and would also insure a supply to be purchased at a time when coal could be easily secured.

The Government now gets its coal by bids. The yards of the District do not have sufficient capacity for storing coal, and they do not have the equipment that is necessary for handling it; and it is believed by the Committee on Mines and Mining that the passage of such a resolution looking to the establishment of a yard for the purpose of supplying the Government would be not only an economical transaction but would result in securing an adequate supply for the Government.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. In what manner has the coal been purchased for the Government heretofore?

Mr. FOSTER. By bids from local dealers in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOWELL. Retailers?

Mr. FOSTER. Wholesalers and retailers. I think the coal which supplies the Capitol is purchased direct from the mines.

Mr. DOWELL. Has it not been possible to purchase all of it at the mines?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know; but it has not always been done.

Mr. DOWELL. It has all been purchased from the retail dealers.

Mr. FOSTER. As I say, so far as I know except for the Capitol.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me five minutes?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Permit me to say that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Mines and Mining after hearing statements from those who knew something about it, and we believe that the establishment of this yard would be of great value.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I notice that the report of the committee says that a saving of 76 cents a ton has been made by one department of the Government because it has been able to handle and deliver its own coal supply. How many hundred thousand tons of coal do the departments use?

Mr. FOSTER. I can not give the gentleman the information since all these new places have been opened up, but previous to the war it was about 225,000 tons.

Mr. MADDEN. So that would be about $2 a ton for the year, if we spend $400,000 for a yard. If the Government can save 76 cents a ton on coal at the yards, I would like to know why it does not undertake to save some for the people who pay the cost of running the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Illinois, and this year has demonstrated beyond doubt that in the District of Columbia, or in any other place throughout the United States, a yard which would sell to the people in the immediate vicinity at reasonable prices, without permitting them to get into the hands of speculators, would be a blessing.

Mr. MADDEN. But the trouble is that the price that is fixed by the Government for coal to be sold to private consumers is about 95 per cent more than the cost of producing the coal. Instead of trying to save to the private individual, who pays the cost of maintaining the Government, the Government itself has fixed a price beyond all reason, and the coal miners and the coal operators are making more money than they have ever made before and more than they ought to be permitted to make. It costs about $1.01 a ton to mine coal in the bituminous coal fields of Illinois, put on the cars, and yet the operators are allowed to sell this coal for over $2 a ton, which is a profit of 100 per cent.

Mr. GORDON. To sell it where?

Mr. MADDEN. At the mine, and at prices away above that. That is the minimum. There is no industry in the United States that ought to be permitted to get rich at the expense of the overburdened taxpayers in a time like this, and that is what the coal people are doing right now.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with the gentleman, they ought not to be permitted to charge exorbitant prices, but they ought to be compelled to produce coal at a proper price, and this is one way to help start this thing. I hope my colleague will vote for such an arrangement. If the Government can not control the price, there is but one other thing to be done, and that is to take the coal mines of the country and operate them in the interest of the people of the country.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman agree with the statement of his colleague, Mr. MADDEN, that coal can be mined in Illinois for $1.01 a ton?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe that.

Mr. MADDEN. The cost sheets of the mine show that.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman has not examined them lately, I am sure.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to ascertain, if I may, if it is the purpose to present legislation on this question to regulate and control the price of coal purchased by the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. No; this provides that the Government shall purchase its own coal for use in the District.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there to be a provision to compel a department to purchase under this resolution?

Mr. FOSTER. There will be succeeding legislation. If they report the advisability of establishing a coal yard, then legislation will be necessary which would then, I suppose, provide that it should be done.

Mr. DOWELL. But, as I understand it, they are now purchasing at retail, each department paying the price it pleases and doing what it pleases. This will not correct that as I understand it.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; it will.

Mr. DOWELL. This resolution?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. DOWELL. It will be necessary to have further legislation?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. I am asking if it is the purpose to introduce further legislation to follow this resolution up, to fix the price?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. Is this price to be fixed on the same basis as the price generally to the public, or is it to be for what it is actually produced?

Mr. FOSTER. I can not answer the gentleman on that point.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The District of Columbia is a purely governmental reservation, intended for the purposes of the Government. Is it the idea of this committee that there would also be included in this resolution a report as to the advisability or propriety of purchasing coal for those who are residents of this governmental reservation?

Mr. FOSTER. This resolution itself does not provide for that.

Mr. GARD. I understand it does not; but is it in the mind of the committee that the resolution should be so extended as to include that?

Mr. FOSTER. I can say to the gentleman that in my own private opinion—and I am not speaking for the committee—I would welcome the time when opportunity may be afforded to sell to the people of the District of Columbia in an emergency such as we have had this winter.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I presume the object of the resolution is to take care of the coal that is needed by the Government, to establish a place and a means by which the Government can obtain its coal supply? Is not this resolution as it is drawn broader than that? Does it not occur to the gentleman from an inspection of the resolution that it has in mind a report as to plans for a general distribution of coal?

Mr. FOSTER. I think not.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What does the language "independent establishments" mean?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a well-defined term. "Independent establishments" means such establishments of the Government as the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Trade Commission—all of those establishments not under any executive department of the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am merely submitting my judgment of the matter, but I think it ought to be limited.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my colleague is wrong about that. I think that is well understood.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection to inserting before the word "establishments" the word "governmental," so as to correct any ambiguity that exists in the present phraseology? It would then read "independent governmental establishments." And that would remove all doubt as to the purpose of this depot.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not any objection to that if it makes it any plainer, but I do not think it needs it. It is very well defined.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield me, say, 10 minutes?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Allow me to present a parliamentary inquiry. Mr. Speaker, I would like to present this parliamentary inquiry——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. So as to obtain a ruling from the Chair, if the gentleman from Illinois will also yield for that purpose. This is Calendar Wednesday. The rule under which we are proceeding provides that not more than two hours of general debate shall be permitted on any measure called up on Calendar Wednesday, and all debate must be confined to the subject matter of the bill. Heretofore, Mr. Speaker, on Calendar Wednesday, when bills on the House Calendar have been considered, it was the practice—though it has been questioned, but never presented to the Chair for a ruling—that there should be two hours of general debate, one hour in favor and, presumably, one hour opposed. In my acquaintance with the House I do not know of any general debate, as such, except on a bill which is on the Union Calendar, where the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or a bill on the Private Calendar, where the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House. When this amendment was first proposed, the purpose of it was to curtail unlimited general debate on bills considered on Calendar Wednesday which were on the Union Calendar, so that the whole time of the proceedings could not be frittered away in general debate. Its very purpose was to try to expedite the consideration of the bills which were considered on Calendar Wednesday.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, though I do not profess to have gone into the details as much as I should have, that on a bill on the House Calendar there can not be any general debate; that the ordinary rules of the House should apply, namely, that the gentleman who has charge of the bill has an hour at his disposal, during which time he can move the previous question, and I wish to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that whenever bills on the House Calendar have heretofore been considered on Calendar Wednesday, that the practice has been to grant an hour's time of debate in favor and an hour's time of debate in opposition before the gentleman having control of the bill would move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not making a point of order. I am making a parliamentary inquiry, whether in the consideration of this bill there is to be two hours of so-called general debate or whether under the rules of the House the gentleman from Illinois will control the time, so he can move the previous question at any time? Of course, Mr. Speaker, if the Speaker is not prepared to make a ruling that may be adhered to for all time on Calendar Wednesday, I do not wish to press the point, because I believe the gentleman from Illinois will yield time sufficient for the consideration of the bill. However, I thought it advisable to present this matter for the consideration of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rather defer the matter until next Calendar Wednesday, because he can hunt it up and make a ruling that will stick.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 12 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution, in my judgment, should not pass. We are in war time. As a war measure we have fuel inspectors, food inspectors, and very properly. As a war measure we have seized the railroads and all other means of transportation on land and on sea. Some time or other the war will end, and I do not believe that a joint resolution of this kind should pass looking toward the legislation that is proposed when the report is received. In the law as it is now it is the duty in normal times for the respective departments to advertise and give all the world in the production of coal a chance to bid and give bond and security for the fulfillment of the contract. So far as I know and believe this law in normal times has been sufficient to get the best service for the least money. This is looking to the establishment of a coal yard. If you have a coal yard and the necessary machinery and purchase the necessary plant and establish it for the purpose of buying coal in the amount of 250,000 tons when the total production of coal in the United States is—how much?

Mr. FOSTER. Last year 675,000,000 tons.

Mr. CANNON. Six hundred and seventy-five million tons. I think we had better proceed as we are now proceeding. It is true that with an exceptional season, under peculiar conditions that I can not now take time to discuss, with railroad transportation exceeding what it ever has been, with a larger gross and a smaller net, we have a great slump in railway securities and a great destruction in the credit of railways so that the President has, in my judgment, properly as a war power, taken possession of the railroads and other means of transportation. There is an agitation. Why, gentlemen rush into print? We want to lay a foundation now, not to take care of the war, but we want to legislate for a time of peace. I think we had better let this war end and then, free from excitement, let us proceed to enact such legislation as is necessary.

Ah, do you know what a Government coal yard would cost? God knows; I do not know. I expect a quarter of a million. You have got to have your engines, you have got to have all your appointments; and my observation has been that the Government in the payment of its employees does not conduct a particularly economical service.

I want to say—although my friend knows that I am against the resolution, and he has kindly yielded me 10 minutes—he seems to be, from an intimation had, of the opinion that this thing might expand, and that the coal mines, if I understand him properly, in the United States could be permanently seized and that we might, at least in the District of Columbia and presumably elsewhere, proceed to operate mines and furnish 110,000,000 people with coal.

Maybe I am old-fashioned. I expect I am. But competition is the life of trade, and I pray God that in my time, at least, the Government will not, under the pretense or under the excitement of a war period lay the foundation, great or small, to care for the business of the country by the regulation of prices, and so forth, by governmental authority.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish I could always agree with my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on public questions. Generally I do agree with him. But I see no real objection to the passage of this resolution in its present form. It contemplates an inquiry, and only an inquiry, as to what might be done for the Government only in the District of Columbia. Therefore it can hardly be said to be a Government ownership proposition in the general sense to which the gentleman from Illinois refers. It seems to me it might be a good thing to pass a resolution like this in the present war crisis. It is the war crisis that brought about the high price of coal and the confusion resulting in the taking over of the railroads by the President of the United States, a proposition upon which very few Members of this House would have agreed a year or two ago. But the crisis is here, and it is due to war conditions. And not only is the Government at a disadvantage, but the people of the District of Columbia are suffering. Indeed, if we pass a resolution of this kind and it should result in the erection of a coal-storage yard, it might be made sufficiently large and of such capacity that in another such crisis not only the Government might be served, but the people in distress over coal prices and coal scarcity due to war emergencies might also be served. It might be a good thing even to have the Secretary of the Interior inquire as to a coal bin of the capacity of 500,000 tons, if 250,000 tons is the amount necessary for the actual needs of the Government, and thus give the people who are without coal and freezing in their homes a chance to come in on equal terms with the Government. It would be the humane thing when the ordinary supply methods fail.

An inquiry like this may do some good.

There is ample proof to show at the present time that neither the Government nor the people have taken advantage of their opportunity to obtain coal in due season. They have utilized one method of transportation only. They have used the rails until they have stopped the cars and blocked the tracks, and yet other means of communication, like from Cumberland yonder to the District of Columbia, have gone to waste because of the prejudice against waterways and canals—a helpful and competitive or relief method of transportation.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the gentleman give us a sort of a percentage or average of reduction in the cost of foods and fuels to the consumers since our bill passed?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There has been no reduction in the cost of consumption anywhere. The cost of consumption has steadily gone up, but it has gone up very largely by reason of the fact that the common carriers of the country have had their cars used as storage warehouses instead of distributing agencies which might operate for the relief of the people. And at great construction works now cars that ought to be used for carrying foodstuffs to the people are standing upon the tracks idle, paying demurrage on cargoes of lumber and heavy freight that ought to have been discharged days and weeks ago.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Missouri asked you to state what reduction, if any, had resulted in prices by reason of the fuel and food control. Can the gentleman state in what manner prices were held down, and what increase there might have been if we had not had that control?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is aware of the fact that prices have not come down. If the gentleman wants concrete details, I will tell him. We are paying 85 cents a dozen at our house now, in the District of Columbia, for eggs.

Mr. SNYDER. Ninety cents a dozen.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And they are going to a dollar.

Mr. WINGO. If you had not had fuel and food control, prices might have gone a great deal higher. Of course, food control does not cause the hens to lay any more rapidly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Nor make the grass grow.

But before my time expires I want to say this, that our present stringency in the coal market in the District of Columbia is due to the fact, as it is in other large cities, that in times of plenty, when we had ample means of transportation, we did not avail ourselves of the supply or of the auxiliary means of transportation. So that when the freeze came and the crisis is on, stress naturally follows.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] if I can have more time?

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry, but I have promised to yield all of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from Illinois, Mr. DENISON.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am unalterably opposed to this resolution for more than one reason. In the first place, it is an entering wedge to Government ownership, to which I have always been opposed.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] speaks about the high cost of living and says that eggs are 90 cents a dozen. Do not worry, my friend. The funny man down at the theater the other night said that a chicken was a valuable bird; you could eat it before or after it was hatched. [Laughter.] Do not worry about the price going up, because they are cold-storage eggs anyway.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is certainly consolation to the consumer, anyway.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, it may develop into a chicken. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is plenty of time yet.

Mr. FORDNEY. The report of the committee says on page 2 that the Treasury Department last year sent to Congress an estimate of $400,000 to equip those Government coal yards. Everybody knows that conditions are critical all over the country, in shipping especially. We do not give enough consideration to the causes of this condition. In the first place, the Congress of the United States is responsible for legislation that has crippled the railroads of the country. The Interstate Commerce Commission fixes the maximum rates the railroads can charge for hauling freight, and the politicians of Congress have fixed the minimum wage scale on railroads, and the two are so close together that it does not yield a reasonable profit to the railroads to supply the money necessary to purchase equipment, railroad cars, and motive power, and, consequently, with the greatly increased volume of business in this country caused by this war, there are not enough railroad cars and railroad engines in the country to carry the freight to its destination and to provide suitable terminals to take care of that freight.

And let me call your attention to this fact, gentlemen, that prior to the war our exports never exceeded two and one-half billion dollars in value in any one year, and yet in the year 1917 our exports reached the enormous sum of $6,000,000,000. Prior to the war our imports never exceeded $1,825,000,000 in any one year, but in 1917 they reached the enormous sum of $3,000,000,000.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. How do you get that figure as to imports? You do not get it from the amount of duties paid, do you?

Mr. FORDNEY. You get it from the volume of business reported by the Department of Commerce, my friend, showing the value of imports.

Mr. SLOAN. What does it show about the revenues arising from those enormous imports?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not wish to advert to that, but the ad valorem rate on our imports last year was 7 per cent—pretty close to free trade. And yet to-day our President recommends universal free trade to the whole world. The Kaiser may speak for the German people, or for himself, but the President does not speak for me when he says the people of the United States are in favor of free trade. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am in favor of that label, "Made in America," not that "Made in Germany." [Applause.]

My friends, we are bordering near to Government ownership. I doubt seriously if the railroads of this country will ever return to private ownership again, and if not, it is a mighty serious question for the people of the United States.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The Government owns the different buildings and the different furnished rooms where the coal is consumed in the different departments in the District?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. What objection can the gentleman have to the Government owning a central storage plant and the machinery to handle it?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not in favor of any kind of Government ownership, because the Government can not do at double the price the things that firms and individuals can do. The Government can go out and buy coal anywhere in the United States, and there is no law or regulation preventing it. Why, then, should we legislate on this matter?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is in favor of the Government owning the Panama Canal, is he not?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is a different proposition altogether.

Mr. COX. Yet the Government built it.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is a different proposition altogether, I will say to my friend.

Now, let me answer the gentleman. I made this statement on this floor before. For the year 1913 I have the cost of carrying freight on the railroads in all the principal countries of the world. You can obtain it. Let me call your attention to this fact, and see whether there is any recommendation in it for Government ownership. In the year 1913 the Government of Germany owned 95 per cent of all the railroads in Germany—the only country in the world owning that large percentage of the railroads.

The wage scale in Germany for that year was $7.76 a week on her railroads, and the freight cost was 1.42 cents per ton per mile. The wage scale on the railroads in the United States was $15.56 per week, or double the wage scale in Germany, and the freight carried was seventy-two one-hundredths of a cent per ton per mile. Our wage scale double that of Germany and our freight cost one-half that of Germany. Do you get any recommendation in favor of Government ownership in that, my friend? If so, tell me what it is.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Do you recognize that the cost of carriage is very much less where the average haul is two or three times as far?

Mr. FORDNEY. I recognize, my friend, that the population per square mile in Germany is five times that of the United States, and consequently their freight ought to be cheaper than ours. I know we have a longer haul in this country than they have in Germany. The center of population in the United States is just west of Indianapolis. The long haul is from the Pacific coast. The center of population of Germany is around a very thickly populated territory.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question along that line?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but I have but a limited time.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman realize that the average cost per ton per mile in Germany is made up of high-class freight, and that in Germany the cheap freight goes by water?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not recognize anything of the kind. I recognize that it is made up in Germany just as it is made up here, and not differently at all. I have not got time to discuss that question fully, but I can show it to you, my friend, if necessary.

Mr. HARDY. But that is the fact, nevertheless.

Mr. FORDNEY. There are difficulties to overcome. I am not criticizing the administration. I have stood loyally by this administration since the war began and I am going to continue to do so, and the administration will be entitled to any credit coming out of this war and should have any criticism that belongs to them. I know of a port on the Atlantic coast where to-day there are 800 carloads of hay piled up, and they will not unload it off the cars, because they are waiting for a ship to send that hay abroad, and there is no ship in sight. I know of a special delivery of anchors that were given the right of way as class A freight. Those anchors reached a shipyard on the Atlantic coast, and the keel for the ship on which those anchors are to be used has not yet been laid. Yet those cars must be utilized for shipping anchors, while you and I go cold for the want of coal and of cars in which to ship it. Now, that may be good management. I do not know who is to blame or whether anybody is to blame. I am not finding fault with that; but that is the condition, and that is why there is a shortage of coal cars. Last night I talked with a coal operator from West Virginia, who has at his mine 40,000 tons of coal in stock and can not get a car to ship a ton of it North or East or West, and he is here appealing to this board to get cars to ship his coal. Where are they? You and I who travel over the roads see upon the side tracks of the country thousands of cars which are loaded waiting for some opportunity to unload.

Who is to blame? I do not know. I do not blame anybody. It is a condition that is here, and a serious one, and since the Government has taken over the railroads, a very short time ago, I do not see any change. I hope it is for the better, and let us all hope and do all we can to better these conditions. But I do not believe you better the condition of the people of this country when you resort to Government ownership. In our recent tax bill we aimed to put the taxes upon the incomes of the country, the rich people of the country. I want to know whether or not you believe that is going to work out just as that law was intended? The other day, my good friends, I sent to a meat market in my home town for some steak and paid 60 cents a pound for choice cuts of beefsteak. Who pays for that beef? The consumer. Who pays $7 or $8 for a pair of shoes that you and I used to buy for $4 or $5? The consumer, every time. The manufacturer and the producer must add to their overhead cost and will do so, because every dollar of tax that you put upon an article produced in a factory will be added to the price of the article. You can not tax the rich men of this country without putting a proportionate burden upon the consumer. Every time you add to the cost of production you add to the cost to the consumer. You can not get away from that; and Government ownership, that costs more to do the thing than the individual or the set of individuals can do it for, will add to the burden upon the poor people of this country. Think that over. You can not get away from it my good friends, and the more carefully you study that question the more thoroughly you will be convinced that those conditions are as I have stated. I am opposed to Government ownership of anything—it makes no difference what—except some things that the individual can not do. Therefore, my friends, I hope this resolution will fail. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield me some time? I should like to have about 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 30 minutes.

Mr. DENISON. How much time is there for general debate?

The SPEAKER. Two hours from the time it began. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has 23 minutes left of his hour. The gentleman asks to have his time extended 30 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that at the expiration of the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] or any other gentleman on this side in opposition would be entitled to recognition for one hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] represents the opposition or not.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand from the statement of the Speaker a little while ago that the parliamentary question raised will be deferred, and that during the consideration of this resolution we will proceed under the one-hour rule. I have yielded time to those opposed to the bill as well as to those favoring it. With that understanding I have yielded more time to those opposed to the bill than to those for it. Now I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended 30 minutes beyond the hour.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is two hours, is it not?

Mr. FOSTER. No; an hour.

Mr. CANNON. And then there is another hour.
Mr. ROBBINS. Who has the other hour?
Mr. FOSTER. Nobody.
Mr. STAFFORD. Why not ask to have your time extended one hour, and then yield?
Mr. FOSTER. I will yield to my colleague the right to control some of the time.
The SPEAKER. To begin with, each side has an hour. That much is clear. The Speaker is not going to render any opinion on technical points until he has a chance to study them. Now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks that his time be extended 30 minutes.
Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I made that request thinking that the Speaker was not going to decide that question now.
The SPEAKER. I am not going to decide it, except this far, that after the gentleman from Illinois gets through with his hour the opposition will have an hour.
Mr. FOSTER. I have already yielded 20 minutes' time to the opposition, and if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] controls the time in opposition, I hope he will yield some time to those who favor the bill, and I think he will.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 30 minutes. Is there objection?
Mr. CANNON. Why not have a gentleman's agreement that whoever is recognized in opposition will yield 20 minutes to my colleague [Mr. FOSTER]?
Mr. FOSTER. That is fair, and I withdraw my request for an extension of time.
Mr. DENISON. I am not opposed to the bill. I am in favor of the bill.
The SPEAKER. The rule is explicit in one thing: That on Calendar Wednesday the general debate is limited to two hours, and that one hour of it shall be controlled by the peope in favor of the bill and the other hour by those opposed. That much is clear.
Mr. DENISON. It is my intention to yield time to those who request it, whether they are for the bill or against it.
The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman want to control the hour in opposition to this bill?
Mr. CANNON. I will ask to control it, but I may or may not use it. If I do control it I will yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ilinois.
Mr. STAFFORD. It has been customary for the ranking member of the committee to control the time, even though he was not in favor of the bill, and to yield to those opposing it.
Mr. DENISON. I will yield to anyone who is against the proposition.
Mr. CANNON. Then that is satisfactory to me.
Mr. DENISON. I will yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.
The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Illinois has 43 minutes.
Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COOPER].
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I listened a moment ago to the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], in which he gave what he said was a fair comparison between the freight rates on Government-owned railroads in Europe and the rates on privately-owned railroads in this country. And when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] interrupted him with questions suggesting that freight rates in Europe on Government-owned roads cover the transportation of more kinds of freight than do freight rates on our corporation-owned roads and cover the transportation also of some articles which are never carried as freight in this country, I heard the gentleman from Michigan deny specifically and absolutely what the gentleman from Texas intimated, and then follow that denial with the statement that freight rates are much lower here than on the Government-owned roads in Germany. Now, I am not going to speak in favor of Government ownership of railroads, but have taken the floor at this time merely to show that the gentleman from Michigan was, as I think, much mistaken in that denial and statement—a statement which is only a repetition of what he has heretofore said on the same subject in debates here.

I have in my hand a book written by Carl Vrooman, published by the Oxford University Press, London, and so forth, the preface bearing date "Oxford, July, 1910." The title of the volume is "American Railway Problems in the Light of European Experience, or Government Regulation versus Government Operation of Railways." Let us see what are here set forth as the facts about rates under Government ownership:

"Undoubtedly, the question which interests the general public most is that of rates. This is not the most important question connected with the railway problem, but it is the one which touches the public most immediately. Any comparison of railway rates between different countries, however, must necessarily be more or less unscientific, owing to the varying conditions under which their lines are run and the different rate schedules which are employed.

"But while no entirely satisfactory comparison of the rates of one country with those of another has been or can be made, at the same time comparisons can be instituted which will prove of very great practical value as making clear certain highly important facts. The most difficult attempt of this sort upon which one can embark is that of making a comparison between the rates of American railways and those of European countries. Take, for example, the case of Prussia. It is extremely difficult to make any comparison between the rates on her State roads and those on our corporation roads, because, first, the general scale of wages is distinctly higher in America than in Germany; secondly, the length of haul for freight in this country is 242 miles, whereas in Prussia it is only 71½ miles, causing the terminal expenses to constitute a much larger per cent of the expense of transportation in Prussia than they do with us; thirdly, most of the heavy and bulky freight materials, such as ores, minerals, fertilizers, timber, etc., in Prussia are carried by water, while with us they are generally carried by rail. Moreover, the cream of the American freight, that part which pays the highest rate, is carried at exorbitant rates by our express companies, whereas in Germany it is counted as freight and helps to raise the general average of the price for carrying a ton of freight a mile; fourthly, in America large quantities of freight are carried for the companies themselves, for which no charge is made, whereas in Germany every ton so carried is actually paid for; fifthly, the German roads carry an immense quantity of mail, including parcels, for which they get no pay, while the American roads receive very high pay for every ounce of mail carried by them.

"Messrs. Hoff and Schwabach, the Prussian commissioners sent to this country a few years ago to study and report on the American railway system, made a careful effort to take into account all of these diverse factors in their comparison instituted between our rates and those of the Prussian State lines. The conclusion which they arrived at, after making allowances for all the factors which have tended to reduce the average price for carrying a ton of freight a mile in this country, was that under similar conditions the average rate in America would be 1.44 cents per ton per mile, while on the Prussian State railways it would be only 0.95 of a cent. In the course of their interesting and valuable discussion of this subject, they say:

"American freight rates are divided into very many grades; they consequently reach and sometimes fall below the level of the German standard rates for long distances; that is to say, for the distances which with us do not come into question for the bulk of the traffic. However, as with us the bulk of the freight movement takes place within distances which, according to American ideas, must be called short, the natural consequence of geographical and economic conditions, it is permissible to say that the goods transported in standard classes, which amount with us to about 35 per cent of the total freight, enjoy in Prussia-Hesse and nearly throughout Germany a lower freight rate than the goods forwarded in America according to the standard classes in force in that country. (The average distance of transportation of all freight amounts with us to 115 kilometers (or 71.5 miles), in America to 390 kilometers (or 242.33 miles). * * *

"If the freight rates for articles in bulk are to be compared with any pretense to correctness it stands to reason that it is necessary to come down to the distances over which goods are actually transported in Germany, and then the aspect is not unfavorable to our conditions after all.

"The Hon. Charles A. Prouty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, some time ago made an interesting comparison of rates from his home town, Newport, Vt., to Boston, with rates for the same distance in Iowa (where, owing to the activity of their State railway commission, rates are low for this country), and with rates for a similar haul in Prussia, where the rates are lower still.

[Rates in cents per 100 pounds.]

	Newport, Vt., to Boston.	Iowa rate for same distance.	German rate.
Potatoes	19	12½	9.6
Hay	17	11	10½
Butter	46	26	36
Sugar	19	17.1	10.9
Lumber	10⅝	9½	6.4
Fertilizers	17	9½	8

"Commissioner Prouty further says:

"Last summer a company in which I was interested had occasion to transport considerable quantities of copper wire from Phillipsdale, R. I., to Bradford, Vt., and of dynamos and transformers from Pittsfield, Mass., to the same destination. We paid in less than carloads from Phillipsdale 32 cents per hundred pounds and from Pittsfield 45 cents per hundred pounds. The corresponding rates in Prussia are 11.08 and 15 cents.

"In the most recent and perhaps most authoritative comparison of Prussian and American railway rates that has yet appeared, Prof. Henry C. Adams, statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission, after giving a number of exhaustive tables of rates in both countries, says:

"Quite a number of distinct impressions are derived from a study of the above tables. In the first place, it is observed that the Prussian rates are much more regular and uniform than American rates, thus showing that they are not exposed to the influence of temporary changes of commercial conditions or to the passing demands of shippers or localities. The degree of uniformity disclosed indicates that commercial conditions in Prussia are supposed to adjust themselves to railway tariffs rather than railway tariffs to industrial conditions, except it be that the industrial conditions which call for a departure from the rule of uniformity are of a permanent character. Which of these two policies is preferable, and whether stability of railway tariffs, or what railway advocates in this country call elasticity of railway tariffs, is preferable, is again a question of judgment, and for this reason is excluded from further consideration. A second impression left by a study of the above tables is that for a distance not exceeding the average haul on Prussian railways the Prussian rates are lower than the American rates, but that for long hauls the American rates are lower than the Prussian rates.

"A less complex and fairer comparison could be made between the rates of the Prussian State roads and those of the corporation roads of some other European country, such as England or France. In fact, in 1902 such a comparison of the freight rates of Prussia and Great Britain was made by a British 'select committee.' The conclusion arrived at by the committee was that the 'cost of transportation on the German railways, as concerns the Levant and East African tariffs, is only one-third to one-fifth as high for a large number of commodities as the British rate.'"

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. My colleague undoubtedly knows that under the German system they produce a large profit, which goes into the treasury?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. If that profit were distributed over the rates, it would result in a still greater reduction.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is very true, and I am glad to have that interruption by my colleague. I knew the fact he stated, but I had forgotten to mention it. Under similar conditions and a fair comparison based on those conditions the freight rates on the Government-owned railroads in Germany have been cheaper than have freight rates in this country.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. While the rates are lower, is it not a fact that the wages paid for labor in this country are a great deal higher?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In the first paragraph which I read from this book, the author says that wages are lower in Germany, but he says that freight rates also are lower there, whereas the gentleman from Michigan said that our wages are higher, but that our freight rates are very much less than they are in Germany. That was his statement, but according to these expert investigators that statement is not in accordance with the facts. I have read some of the literature—undoubtedly the same literature—on which the gentleman from Michigan bases his statement, but I took occasion a few years ago to investigate as to the accuracy of some of the articles written by the author of that literature.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman quotes as an author Carl Vrooman. Who is Carl Vrooman—is he an American or an Englishman?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He is an American.

Mr. CANNON. Is he the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes. This book was published in 1910, printed at the University Oxford Press in England.

Mr. CANNON. This was a political campaign document in the campaign of 1910. I do not know, but I think Mr. FORDNEY is as good an authority as Mr. Vrooman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, Mr. Vrooman has given the findings of fact made by official Government representatives who came here from Europe and investigated this subject, and also statements from the report of a British select committee appointed to investigate this exact subject. These are not the ex parte statements of an American railroad employee. These are statements of fact from official reports of German and of British investigators, compiled by Mr. Vrooman, who is now in the employ of our Government in its Agricultural Department. I know of no reason to believe that when he wrote this book he was not entirely disinterested. Nor do I know of any reason to believe that he has not told the truth. As I have said, he bases his statement on official reports of German and of British investigators.

There are many more important things than rates to be considered before it is possible to make a wise decision on the great question of Government ownership. That question is not now before us and I am not discussing it nor advocating Government ownership of railways. But this is a time of all times for accuracy of information and truthfulness of statement; and what we ought always to strive to know before discussing problems of statesmanship are the facts upon which alone it is possible to base intelligent opinion. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is a practical question, and not one that involves theory. The Government has provided for the establishment of a central heating, lighting, and power plant, and has appropriated $1,669,000 for that purpose, of which appropriation very little has been used except to lay the foundations on the tract near the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. The location has railroad sidings and water frontage. That plant will furnish heat, light, and power to all of the Government buildings in the territory in the central part of the city, but the House well knows that that power plant will not be in existence for several years, and that even when it is in existence with its railroad sidings, which will enable it to get coal direct from the mines, there will be no governmental facility for supplying heat, light, and power to the private office buildings that are rented by the Government. For instance, the Department of Justice, the Department of Commerce, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Department of Labor are housed in buildings that are all privately owned under contracts for a term of years. The Government merely rents the building as it stands and furnishes the heat, light, and power. Some means must be provided even when the central heat, light, and power plant is established to provide heat, light, and power for these privately owned buildings. The question is, Shall we continue under the present method? The present method provides for the purchase of coal at the mines, paying the railroad rate from the mines to the city and then providing for its distribution under separate contracts from the railroad sidings to the respective departments and office buildings. The Treasury Department enters into the contract for all the coal utilized by the Government in all of its activities. That price has varied in the last six months. When the President, through Executive order, first fixed the price of coal it was $2.30 at the mines, and, as I recall, the price was increased subsequently by 50 cents. The Government to-day is paying $2.80 or $2.85 for bituminous coal at the mouth of the mine. It then pays something over a dollar for railroad transportation to Washington, and there are some 10 or 12 private parties who have contracted to haul the coal to the various departments. The charge for haulage varies according to the distance the department is from the railroad siding. The Agricultural Department, I think, pays $1.05 a ton.

The Interior Department in the past year has been experimenting with the hauling of coal from the general railroad siding to that department, and the testimony of the chief clerk is that there has been a marked saving in the cost whereby they have saved sufficient to pay for the 5-ton trucks that are used in transporting coal to the Interior Department.

It is upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior that in this year's Book of Estimates there is included an estimate of $200,000 for this very purpose. It is not an extravagant appropriation when you consider that the Government has appropriated $1,670,000 for the erection of a central light, heat, and power plant. Of that $200,000 it is purposed to expend only $10,000 for the purchase of land, $10,000 for roadways to yards, and $70,000 for coal pockets, trestles, and equipment, and $100,000 for the purchase of 25 trucks, at $4,000 each.

This is a practical question. Shall we continue under the existing system or shall we extend the system which we have already adopted in providing a central heat, light, and power plant for the departments and one for the Capitol, both adjoining the railroads, whereby the Government can go into the market, purchase the quality of coal it desires at the mouth of the mine, pay the freight rate to these yards, and provide the means of conveyance from the central coal yard to the various Government establishments?

That is a practical question. It is not a question of Government ownership; it is merely a question of whether the Government shall provide the proper facilities for doing its own work, that and nothing more.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will gladly yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. In line 10, page 1 of the resolution, what is the comprehension of the term "independent establishments in the District of Columbia and vicinity"? How far does that go?

Mr. STAFFORD. As was stated before, it is rather ambiguous, but the gentleman from Illinois stated that he would have no objection to having an amendment to insert after the word "independent," the word "governmental." In the draft of the estimates, I may say to the gentleman, the ambiguity is removed by the following language:

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to establish a fuel storage yard or yards, to procure by purchase or lease of necessary land, wharfs, railroad trestles, and sidings required for such yard or yards, and to procure the necessary storage, handling and distributing equipment, including motor trucks, for the storage of fuel for the use of and for delivery to all the executive departments and independent establishments and the District government in the District of Columbia and vicinity.

The following language, "and the District government in the District of Columbia," would eliminate the ambiguity as it exists in the present resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say to my friend if you limit it to the District of Columbia you leave out some of the governmental establishments.

Mr. STAFFORD. I only suggested to insert the word "governmental" before "establishments."

Mr. FOSTER. The gentlemen, I think, in his service here knows very well what independent establishments mean; that is, establishments like the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, establishments of that kind which are not under the departments.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are good lawyers here like the colleague of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who think that perhaps it is ambiguous, and why not remove the ambiguity by inserting the word "governmental," which will not restrict in the least the object of the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. It is so well established that I think the gentleman agrees with me there is no question about what it means.

Mr. FESS. Can not there be an independent establishment that is not governmental?

Mr. FOSTER. Not under the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, the only question before the House, as far as this resolution is concerned is whether we shall extend the facility whereby the Government can provide heat, light, and power, not only to the Government buildings until the central heat, light, and power plant is completed, but to the privately owned buildings which the Government is renting, which, as the House knows, houses 50 per cent of all the clerical force in the city. Here we have established recently 2,000,000 feet of floor space on the Mall on the site of the old Pennsylvania Railroad station. We have established a heat, light, and power plant there. Is the Government to be hampered by these peculiar conditions with traffic conditions so that it will have to pay the high rates for the haulage of coal from some points distant——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would ask for two minutes more.

Mr. DENISON. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). Distant from the department, when the Government could have a central storage yard for fuel, tributary to some siding or tributary to water connection, saving perhaps many thousands of dollars. It is merely a question of economy. I think the resolution should be passed and that the policy should be adopted for a central storage fuel yard to supply coal to the various Government establishments. [Applause:]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the members of the Committee on Mines and Mining had no idea when we reported this resolution for a central fuel yard or joint purchasing agency for fuel for use of the Government departments that it would provoke a discussion of as many different questions not related to the subject matter of the resolution as have been discussed here to-day. The discussion has wandered far afield. We have discussed Government ownership, the price of eggs, the congestion of freight, freight rates in Germany, Carl Vrooman, and other things. Now, there is not any element of Government ownership in the resolution. There is no question of freight congestion only in an indirect way, that the plan that it is proposed to investigate would have a tendency to relieve such congestion. Now, all that the resolution does is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, through the Director of the Bureau of Mines and Mining, to prepare a plan to show the cost of having a joint establishment—for what? For the Government going into the coal business for the general public? No; but a plan by which the coal that is bought for the different departments of the Government here in Washington, each one buying separately now, bidding against each other, may be bought under one purchasing agent and placed in one yard, thereby saving not only in the price—because it is an elementary business proposition that the larger the volume of your purchase the cheaper you can get the stuff by purchase—but also reduce the different clerical expenses of having all these different departments looking after their particular coal bill. That is all there is to it. It does not involve any Government ownershsip of any kind under the sun. It is a proposition to provide a joint purchasing agent for the fuel for the different departments of the Government. That is all there is to it, and I can not for the life of me see where there can be any objection to it, and there is every reason at this time why we should have a plant of this kind. I, for one, would be willing to vote for a plan like that now, but it is thought best to have this resolution and let it be worked out and report a plan so that the details of it can be worked out with reference to the purchase and storage of the fuel supply of the different departments in the city of Washington. That is all there is to the resolution.

Now, a man is naturally inclined to enter into the other and different questions that have been discussed here. I was very much interested in the discussion of some of the questions by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. We all love the gentleman from Michigan; we all admire not only his splendid character but his remarkable abilities as a business man—one of the ablest men in the House. I was struck by one statement that he made that I never expected to hear the gentleman from Michigan make upon this floor, and that is that the ultimate consumer pays the tax. I knew it was true, and had believed it all these years, and had been contending that; but it was the first time I ever heard the gentleman from Michigan make that admission on the floor, and especially after the question of the tariff had been dragged into the discussion by one of his colleagues, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

There was something said about the fuel control. Now, of course, you can never determine just exactly of what benefit the fuel control has been; but this fact stands out, and I think that every man of any intelligence will agree to this, that the fuel-control bill has in a large measure checked the advance of prices that might have occurred in certain commodities. We know there has been a reduction in price of some of the stable commodities—for instance, flour, which is less than it was when the Food Administration took charge of it. I presume the Fuel Administration may have made mistakes, but I am convinced that there has been some good in spite of the mistakes that have been made.

A question came up concerning Carl Vrooman, with reference to his book as to railways in this country and other countries, it being stated that it was a political campaign document. I do not believe it was. Even if it were, it was a statement of facts and not the ex parte statement of Carl Vrooman. And even if it were, I take it that those who know him recognize him as a great American student and statesman, and on a question of this kind his opinion will command the respect of any man who is not blinded by partisan prejudice. He has rendered great public service and his writings are interesting. To my mind he is one of the ablest men we have in public life. And the statements in that book are borne out by facts from every source, regardless of partisanship.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to support this resolution and all measures which tend to modernize the methods of doing business with the Federal Government. We all recognize the fact that the Government, in the increasing number of divisions and activities in the departments, tends to a multiplication of red tape and to an increase of expense, purely by a failure to coordinate and correlate the different departments of the Government and to modernize their methods.

Now, before the Bureau of Mines was created the purchase of coal for the Government departments was on a most extravagant and unbusinesslike scale. They bought the coal by the ton, without regard to its heat units. It was purely a question of the price per ton by competition. Some coal is almost utterly worthless for heating purposes. Some coal is of very high value. It was not until after the Bureau of Mines was created that we had a method of determining on behalf of the Government what the big business man has determined for himself, to wit, the value of the coal according to the heat unit it contains. I have no doubt there are departments still in the Government that are buying coal according to the old plan, without referring the matter to the Bureau of Mines to determine the British thermal unit.

Mr. DENISON. I will state to the gentleman that the committee is going to report a bill that will control that.

Mr. GILLETT. Is it not a fact that all the coal for the departments is bought by the general supply committee?

Mr. BORLAND. I say that I think all the coal is bought by the general supply committee, and I think now it is submitted to the Bureau of Mines for a test; but it may be, and I would not be surprised to find if it were true, that there were some of these independent departments, the District government or elsewhere, that were still buying under the old plan.

Now, this resolution simply provides for an investigation on the part of the Bureau of Mines of the feasibility and cost of providing a Government coal yard for the departments in Washington. That is not a Government-ownership proposition at all, but if it were it would not frighten me on the subject. I have had some experience with this question of the Government furnishing supplies in connection with the Panama Canal. We maintained and were compelled to maintain down there a Government commissary, not only to supply the Government but 37,000 men in the working force of the canal. Otherwise there would have been profiteering, poor supplies, discontent, dissatisfaction, and a decrease in the earning power of the man who was working for the Government, and all of those attendant evils. That Government commissary at Panama fully justified itself, and I challenge any gentleman in this House who knows the facts to say that it did not fully justify its purpose. It was run economically, and men at work on the Panama Canal procured supplies at very reasonable prices. I noticed that in many cases they were paying less for beef on the Panama Canal than I was paying for it for my own household use in Washington or in Kansas City; and the same is true, or ought to be true, in regard to the Government supply of coal.

Now, the gentlemen speak about the congestion of cars. The very purpose of a Government yard is to purchase the Government supply of coal at a time when it can be delivered without congestion on the railroads. The great trouble now is that there is congestion and everybody is ordering supplies at the same time. The great heating plant of this Capitol is living from day to day, taking its coal direct from coal cars as they come into Washington. I think every car of coal that is used by the Government heating plant here must be hauled in the day or the week that it is used. That is one cause of the congestion. Suppose we had a supply on hand, as many great manufacturing concerns have throughout the Middle West—a supply of coal on hand to run the Government for a certain number of months, without the necessity of taking it direct from the coal cars.

My own private opinion of the cause of the shortage of coal at this time is that it is due to the fact that the food and fuel bill was filibustered against for two months last summer after it ought to have passed both Houses of Congress and at a time when the big consumers of coal, who formerly bought by annual contract, ought to have bought their supplies but were unable to do so. When the cold weather came on the big consumer and the small consumer were compelled at the same time to put in their orders, and the result has been that the small consumer, as usual, has not got the best of the situation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman is aware of the fact that in many States, even after that bill became a law, it was a matter of one or two months, or perhaps three months, before any State administrator was appointed under it so that anything could be done to carry it into effect?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. I have no doubt that we were fully two months late in putting that fuel bill into effect, and that is the cause of the present distress.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman evidently did not understand me.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand the gentleman's question. He says that after the bill was passed there was a further delay?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not excusing that. I say there was a delay before the bill was passed. The Government ought not to take its part in that active competition. It ought to supply itself at a time when coal can be mined and transported for the advantage of the consumers of coal without congesting the small consumers. I am in favor of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to oppose this resolution. I seem to be somewhat lonely in my efforts, but, nevertheless, I am sincere.

This resolution proposes two things, and, judging from its title, it proposes to establish a coal yard in the District of Columbia. You would not suspect, from looking at the title, that it proposes anything else. Yet on lines 4 and 5, on page 2, it does suggest that it proposes to make an inquiry into the matter of the purchase and supply of fuel in the District of Columbia.

Now, there are about 26 coal yards in the District of Columbia, as I am informed about this matter. The Government buys all its coal by public advertisement, after bids are submitted showing the quality of the coal required and the British thermal units it must contain. The coal is subjected to investigation and test at the Bureau of Standards before it is accepted or before the Government will accept bids for supplying it. The Government has all the mines of the United States tributary to the Government plants rated as to the quality of the coal produced and whether it is acceptable and comes up to the Government standard for the purpose required.

Mr. BORLAND. That has only been the rule since the creation of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. ROBBINS. It has been the rule for several years. It is a sufficient answer to say that it has been the rule for some time and for the last two years.

The trouble in the whole situation is not a lack of coal or a lack of labor but a lack of transportation facilities. In 1915 we produced 442,624,426 tons of bituminous coal. In 1916 we produced 502,518,545 tons, and up to the 31st of October, 1917, we produced 454,326,059 tons, or 40,833,075 tons above the amount produced at the same date in 1916. But the question is how to get that coal to market. We have not been able to market it, and the reason why we have not been able to market it is because the Government has interfered with the legitimate means of transportation by giving preferential orders and ordering continuous movement of coal. At one time there were 20,000 cars up at Lake Erie ports waiting to be loaded on the boats for transportation up the Lakes. Movements of that kind have so disorganized the transportation of coal in the United States that we have not been able to get the coal produced to market.

Now, what is the purpose of this resolution in proposing to establish a coal yard in the city of Washington? How is it going to save any expense to the Government or relieve the situation? It is simply asking us to put the Government into competition with 20 or 30 coal yards now in operation here that could and will furnish this coal on competitive bids to the various governmental departments, and it is proposed by this resolution to establish in the District of Columbia coal yards and to enter upon the business of dealing in coal on a wholesale basis.

That, however, is not the real purpose of it at all.

Another thing about this resolution that is wrong is that it does not take into account the fact that if it does propose to establish this coal yard, it also proposes to embark the Government upon an expenditure of a large sum of money. They have already investigated this subject, because we see on page 2 of the committee report the statement that the Treasury Department last year sent to Congress an estimate of $400,000 for establishing a coal yard in the District of Columbia. That is the secret of this thing, and that is what is back of this resolution. There are some people in the city of Washington doubtless who have on hand a piece of property that they want to sell to the Government as a coal yard for $400,000. They want to sell that property to the Government at a big price.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman know that the Government now owns property on which this coal yard can be established without buying it?

Mr. ROBBINS. I only know what this committee report states.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is charging that somebody wants to sell some property.

Mr. ROBBINS. Has the Government bought a property?

Mr. FOSTER. No. It owns the property now.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why, then, does the committee that has investigated this subject state that here is a proposition made last year to appropriate $400,000 to establish this coal yard?

Mr. FOSTER. Surely.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is an exorbitant expenditure of money for a coal yard, now that we are at war and will need all our money to fight the Kaiser. A coal yard involves a railroad siding and some pockets that the Government would put up for the purpose of getting the coal dumped from the cars. It is suggested here that we have rail transportation and water transportation, and that we ought to take and use the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal, which runs from here to Cumberland, that is now dry or probably frozen up and not navigable at this season, and in that case we would have to have a yard on the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal, with equipment of cranes and lifts from the boats to pockets, and another one established somewhere else, along some railroad, entirely differently equipped and at a distance, so that we are not going to conserve the supply or reduce the price by establishing these various coal yards.

Mr. FOSTER. You ought not to involve others by undertaking to say what they are trying to do.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am only saying what this report says, that a proposition of $400,000 was submitted last year by the Treasury Department.

Mr. FOSTER. The report states that the Treasury Department last year sent to Congress an estimate of $400,000 for the establishment of a coal yard.

Mr. ROBBINS. I say that, too.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that all?

Mr. ROBBINS. Therefore I say that if you are going to establish coal yards, as suggested in this report, you are going to spend $400,000 for it.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that it may take more than that.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is worse yet.

Mr. FOSTER. We can save that in one year.

Mr. ROBBINS. How will you save it?

Mr. FOSTER. On the price of coal as supplied to the District of Columbia and to the Government here.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I know something about the coal business. I was raised in a coal country, up in western Pennsylvania, and the congressional district which I have the honor to represent here produced over 20,000,000 tons of bituminous coal in 1916.

Mr. FOSTER. I know something about it, too, on the side of the people. I know something about the coal business from the side of the consumer of coal.

Mr. ROBBINS. I know it from the side of the consumer and from the side of the producer, both, because I live in a coal country, in western Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOSTER. I live in a coal country. The miners in my district are patriotic, too.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am patriotic, too, and so are the miners of my district; but even patriots can not produce coal when they can not get cars to ship it to market.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not charging the gentleman with any lack of patriotism.

Mr. ROBBINS. Of course you are not. Here is the situation: If the Government is to get this coal as cheap or cheaper than it gets it now it must get it by competitive bids, and it must submit its proposals to the largest number of coal producers. That is the only way in which it can get this coal more cheaply than now. Now, these bids are submitted f. o. b. the tipple in every instance The Government and every other consumer pays the freight, and pays the same freight; hence if you are going to get this coal more cheaply you will only get it by competitive bidding, and your coal yard is not going to give any solution of that question, because the coal yard simply receives the coal from the coal cars at the dumps, and then you have got to transport the coal from those yards to the points of consumption or the various Government buildings, which are the various Government power plants, and that you do by trucks and wagons. Hence the proposition is one of the cost of trucking, not of coal yards or coal storage.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think it possible for the Government to save anything by purchasing coal in larger amounts?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; I do not.

Mr. DENISON. Instead of purchasing it in small amounts?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; the difference between one amount and another larger amount is not a factor in most instances, for this reason: If the Government is buying coal it is buying it by 10,000 or 20,000 ton lots, and a coal producer will not make any difference in his bid to supply a consumer in the city of Washington with 10,000 tons or 15,000 tons or 50,000 tons unless it is all to be delivered within a certain specific time. If the delivery is to extend over a season—5,000 tons a month or 1,000 tons a month—there is no difference in the bid, and you would not get it for a cent less per ton if you were to ask for 50,000 tons than for 10,000 tons, because it all goes in to take care of the general output of the mine, and the operator simply gathers up contracts in the East or at the Lakes—taking western Pennsylvania as an example—for his entire tonnage for the year. He gets his price at the mines, and it does not matter how much each consumer takes; that is, outside of a few tons, which would be exceptional and not apply to the Government. Of course, one car of coal would be a different thing. There would be no saving on that. So I am opposed to this resolution, because I do not see how it would save the Government anything, and it will require the expenditure of a large sum of money and commit the Government to the expenditure of much larger sums in the future, at a time when we need all our money to arm, equip, and support our gallant soldiers, who are fighting this war for freedom and human rights. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, while this resolution on the face of it seems to be a very innocent one, because it provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall direct the Bureau of Mines to make an estimate on plans and specifications, of the approximate cost of establishing fuel yards, and all necessary handling of the same, yet if the Secretary of the Interior makes a report to this House and estimates that the building of a dock, and the purchase of trucks for transporting coal to the different departments will cost $500,000, unquestionably this House will pass it. So why throw ourselves wide open for unnecessary appropriations at this time? This Congress has appropriated already at this session about $1,500,000,000, and the estimates of the departments amount to about $14,000,000,000. The taking over of the railroads by the Government will necessitate perhaps an appropriation of $500,000,000, which we will pass within a few days. The urgent deficiency bill, which we will soon pass, will amount to about $1,500,000,000. The sum total that we will appropriate will amount to perhaps, in round numbers, about $18,000,000,000, or within two or three billions of what we appropriated at the last session, and it is not only possible but very probable that we will appropriate more money at this session than we did in the last.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. WHEELER. We have loaned to the allies now in the neighborhood of $5,000,000,000, and the longer this war continues the more demands they will make upon us for money. And perhaps by next fall the amount will reach $10,000,000,000 or $12,000,000,000. It does seem to me that this Congress instead of trying to appropriate as much money as it can, or instead of laying itself wide open by the passage of bills which would call for immense appropriations, had better economize as much as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the pending resolution. I wish the committee had reported a broader resolution, and provided for a coal yard which would sell coal to all the citizens of the District of Columbia. I believe the sale of coal to citizens is a legitimate activity for any municipal government.

A very interesting experiment along those lines is now being conducted in the city of Denver. Denver is a city of perhaps 250,000 people, not as large as Washington, but in a general way in the same class. Denver was confronted by practically the situation in which the people of Washington now find themselves. The retail dealers put up the price of coal—endeavored to get all that the traffic would bear. That is the general policy among retail dealers over the country. Usually you will find that there is a combination between the retailers by which they maintain prices.

The mayor of the city of Denver decided to go into the coal business. He succeeded in securing contracts with three companies. Under these contracts he secures lump coal for $1.25 a ton less than the price charged by other coal companies to retail dealers. So the mayor makes an initial saving of $1.25 a ton.

In the matter of retailers' profits he has saved between 25 and 50 cents a ton. His net saving to the consumers of Denver on lump coal is about $1.50 a ton at the present time, and he is delivering 800 tons a day.

Mr. ROSE. Is the mayor of Denver able to make such contracts now?

Mr. KEATING. I do not know. The mayor made these contracts last fall. He made the contracts with independent concerns, men who are not in the coal combination; in order to get their product on the market they were ready to make that deal with him. To-day the coal consumers in Denver who patronize the retail dealers—for there is not enough coal obtained by the city to supply all the people—are paying $1.50 a ton more for their coal than those consumers who are dealing with the city.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I noticed an item in the Des Moines paper that the mayor has been selling coal for 45 cents less a ton than the local dealers.

Mr. KEATING. I am glad to see that Iowa is following in the footsteps of Colorado. Iowa is always wise in following Colorado's example, but Colorado is doing a little better than Iowa in this instance.

There is a newspaper in Denver—the Denver Post—that has gone into the coal business on the same basis as the mayor. It acquired the output of two coal companies, and it, too, is saving its customers about $1.50 a ton.

So my friends, in my judgment, the establishment of this coal yard will undoubtedly result in a very large saving to the Government. If you were to extend it so as to give the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a municipal coal yard, they could save the people of Washington millions of dollars a year.

I hope the resolution will pass, and I hope that eventually the committee, in its wisdom, will bring in a resolution to give the people of Washington the benefits of municipal ownership in this important matter. [Applause.]

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. What is the price to the consumer out there in Denver?

Mr. KEATING. In my home city—Pueblo, Colo.—it is $7.25 a ton from the retail dealers. In Denver the city and the Post are selling for from $4.65 to $4.75 a ton. The retailers are charging from $5.95 to $6.45.

Mr. GARLAND. Was it not under such a monopoly that the price of coal was exceedingly high and they could easily take off $1.25 and still have an extraordinary high price?

Mr. KEATING. I do not think Colorado suffers any more from the evils of monopoly than the great State of Pennsylvania, but it is true that Colorado coal companies are pretty well monopolized, and could easily sell lump coal for $1.25 below the price fixed by the national fuel administration.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 16 minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am for the resolution. It has been a hard problem for me to settle in my mind for many years in the past in favor or against Government ownership on many things. I must confess that down to this hour, after investigating the subject to some extent for 8 or 10 years, my mind is not yet clear just how far the Government ought to go in Government ownership on various lines.

I had occasion to go down to the Panama Canal in March, 1913, when the big organization was yet in existence. The man at the head of the Government commissary department was from my State, a man whom I knew personally and had known before he went there. I spent one day with him in the Government commissary. I was informed by him—and this was not off-hand information, it was information based on tangible facts—that through the Government commissary furnishing the employees food and clothing and supplies of various kinds they had actually reduced the cost from 25 to 33⅓ per cent from what we were paying in the States and 80 per cent of the food commodities selling there were raised in the States and shipped to Panama.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman think that Government ownership at Panama, a perfect organization and a success there, would be an argument for making it a success throughout the United States?

Mr. COX. I am not prepared to say that it would. But I am prepared to say that there were physical facts presented to me by Mr. Burke from his purchase and sales in that commissary.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Government got the cost of commodities, including the overhead charges?

Mr. COX. They ran in connection with the commissary a laundry, and the laundry itself employed 1,600 persons. The commissary paid for itself all overhead charges, all of its employees, paid for the laundry, and the least amount of money, if I recollect correctly, that it turned into the Treasury of the United States in one year was $26,000. They had up into the small thousands of employees working in the commissary and in the laundry. That was a concrete illustration to me that Government ownership, under strict regulation, at least was not a failure.

I would like to see, as the gentleman from Colorado well expressed it, this resolution widened and broadened. In my opinion the people of this District are held up by the heels and absolutely skinned from the top of their heads to the soles of their feet by the retailers. I have no question on earth about that. Why, take the increase in rents here. An old building erected 30 years ago, which has not been repapered for 10 years—the price of electricity has not gone up, the price of gas has not increased, taxes and insurance have not increased, and yet the rent has increased from 25 to 33 per cent. Ask the owners why, and they say, "Oh, it is because of the war." Ask the employees, the janitors, who are firing the furnaces in these houses if their salaries have been increased as the result of the war. Oh, no. I know janitors to-day in the city of Washington firing furnaces in apartment houses where they have as many as 16 apartments who get $10 a month and live in the basement of the apartment. And yet the rents of these apartments have increased from 25 to 33 per cent in the last two or three years.

And when I came to make up my mind upon the matter I had come to the conclusion that there is no way to break the strangle hold of monopoly except by Government ownership. I am willing at least to go to the extent of trying out Government ownership. I would like to see this resolution broadened, widened, and deepened to give a coal yard here to supply the people of the District of Columbia and cut out all of the intermediate profits of the middleman. Last summer we had for our consideration before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a bill to establish transportation from the city to the country to carry parcel post; in other words, to put the city consumer and the country producer into direct and immediate touch as far as possible. That bill did not go very far; we did not have hold of it many days until the transportation lines, the railroads, and express companies began to raise their copper heads. I entertain no doubt in my own mind that is but the beginning, and I firmly believe that with that beginning, if that service be established leading from the city to the country, we will begin to reduce the cost of living. It is largely a question of profiteering. You go to the groceryman and ask him why there is an increase of this and that, and he will answer it is because of the war, although he may handle a commodity the war has never laid its hands on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word. Awhile ago there was some talk about the general supply committee of the Government and what it was doing with reference to the supply of coal. Mr. Jones, chairman of the subcommittee on fuel of the general supply committee, made the following statement in answer to a question by Mr. Moss, a former Member of this House:

> Is it your opinion that the coal is purchased as cheaply as it can be purchased under existing conditions?
> Mr. JONES. I think, Mr. Chairman, the Government could no doubt purchase coal a little cheaper if it had a coal yard of its own. I believe it not only could purchase coal cheaper, but the Government officials would feel safer, knowing that they had their coal supply on hand. During this past winter the department officials have been holding their breath, feeling that the supply of coal might run out and that they would not be able to get any more.

I want to call attention to one other thing. The Government operated a building down here beside the Knickerbocker Hotel, which is west of the War Department. The Government was burning anthracite coal and the Knickerbocker was using bituminous, the Government paying $2.40 more for its coal than was the hotel, although the anthracite did not contain as many British thermal units as the bituminous. When the Government took over the hotel it changed the heating plant so as to burn anthracite at $2.40 a ton more than had been formerly paid by the hotel, although getting less heat. I want to say further that the Government in the past has hauled anthracite coal from the Pennsylvania fields to New Mexico, they have hauled anthracite coal to Florida, and they have hauled it out to Fort Logan, Colo., when in Denver people have been using the soft coal to be had in the State of Colorado. That condition has been going on throughout the United States, and in one instance we found where the Government officials had macadamized a road with anthracite coal. There has been all sorts of wastefulness, the throwing away of money, and I think in this instance the Government ought to take some means to establish its own yard where it will be assured of a supply, and at reasonable prices. There is no sense in the Government hauling anthracite coal, as it does, to the State of Wyoming when Wyoming has a good quality of coal. When the haul has been over a land-grant railroad, they have been buying the coal delivered at the post instead of buying it at the mine and having it delivered.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree with the gentleman that the Government has done some very extraordinary things, but I do not want my friend to charge them with crimes they have not committed. I think among all of the peculiar and extravagant things that the Government departments have done, the hauling of anthracite to Wyoming is perhaps not one of them. I do not recall any anthracite having been hauled to my State, although, as an illustration, the gentleman's suggestion is very good, because some things almost as extravagant have been done.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I can show the gentleman where they have hauled coal from the Pennsylvania region to Cheyenne, Wyo.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman may have some information that I have not.

Mr. FOSTER. I am standing for the coal of Wyoming. They have good coal.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly. We have no need for anthracite in Wyoming.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think that these examples of Government extravagance that he cites are good arguments for the Government ownership which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has just advocated?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that that is the mismanagement that we are trying to correct.

Mr. GILLETT. Is not that inevitable in a government like ours?

Mr. FOSTER. I think not, if it is managed by men who are intelligent.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, if properly managed; but would it be?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question respecting the resolution. On page 2 of the resolution, on lines 3 and 4, there is the language "and the feasibility of consolidating all matters relating to the purchase and supply of fuel." Would not that include transportation lines to Washington bringing the coal?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so.

Mr. FESS. It would include the delivery from the yard to the Government establishments?

Mr. FOSTER. The tracks would run into the Government establishments.

Mr. FESS. How does the gentleman discriminate between simply the coal-yard purchase and the supply? That term is used so as to cover all matters that might be involved in establishing the yard and getting this coal.

Mr. FOSTER. Not the matter of transportation.

Mr. FESS. If you control all matters pertaining to it, why would it not include transportation?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman sees a bogey man.

Mr. FESS. I am a friend of the resolution; I am going to vote for the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. Then let me say that this is only a resolution to investigate, anyhow——

Mr. FESS I know.

Mr. FOSTER. And it is not a final resolution that will establish a coal yard.

Mr. FESS. Why not say, "and the feasibility of establishing Government control, of the purchase and supply of fuel," and so forth?

Mr. FOSTER. The only thing is, there may be some other matters that they would like to report to Congress, and this is only a resolution to investigate, and I do not see any harm in it.

Mr. FESS. I am honest in my contention that the words "all matters" would include transportation.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman might make more definite language if this were the final resolution to establish a yard.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have not had an opportunity to study this resolution very carefully, but I wish to ask my colleague if one of the purposes of the resolution, in case it is passed, would be to build these sheds that the Government will be required to store the coal in—these particular sheds that the Government owns? Is that one of the purposes of it?

Mr. FOSTER. I expect they would do it; yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Unless it is so provided in the law does not my colleague fear, from other experiences we have had related by him of shipping coal, for instance, from Wyoming to the Atlantic seaboard and from there to some other places where it was altogether unnecessary, that unless there is some clause in the law compelling the storage of Government coal in the Government sheds that it might be possible that the men who had this law under their hands for administration might rent some of these high-priced buildings in Washington and store the coal there rather than in the Government sheds?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a matter that can be taken up. I think the gentleman also sees a bogie man, too.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman astonished me with his statement of governmental extravagance and incompetence, and I am a little afraid converted me on the other side, but I would like to ask one question in that connection; that is, whether this hauling of coal to western regions where there is already fine coal is still going on on the part of the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that I can answer the gentleman. I want to say this: That the Government need not be extravagant. The Government can coordinate its forces, it can stop duplication if it desires to do so, and it can save all this money that has been wasted in the past. Now, that is very easy if we get men hold of it who are business men and know something about it. There is no question but what that can be done. This is no argument for or against Government ownership. It is an argument in favor of supplying the Government itself with coal for all its activities in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we are the greatest coal-producing nation on earth; in fact, we product within our boundaries, if I recollect rightly, about half of the coal produced in all the world—possibly more. Our coal fields extend from one end of the country to the other. No people in the world are blessed with fuel resources as we are; and yet, in spite of all that, the coal industry, the fuel industry, is rarely in a condition satisfactory to anyone interested in or connected with it, either the producer or the consumer. In the summer the mines are largely idle; in the winter they are run at their utmost capacity. Always there is a shortage somewhere in the winter; always there is some actual suffering for lack of fuel, and that with the greatest coal supply on earth. The conditions we are passing through now differ only from normal conditions in that they are a little worse than usual. The demand is a little greater, the lack of cars is a little more acute, the shortage of fuel more widespread because of an unusually cold spell, but there is nothing strikingly peculiar in the present condition of affairs except that conditions are a little worse than ordinarily; the difference is in degree, not in kind. Some day in this country some genius will arise, let us hope, who will make it his work to bring about a better condition relative to the mining and distribution of coal. Such a man will have a work before him that will be tremendously far-reaching, the beneficial effects of which can scarcely be calculated.

Mr. DENISON. Will my friend, the gentleman, yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to make this suggestion: Mr. Giragossian claims that the Garabed would do away with the use of coal. It may be the gentleman thinks Mr. Giragossian may be the genius the gentleman was speaking about?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I wish Mr. Giragossian and his Garabed well. I only wish I had a little more faith in Mr. Giragossian and his invention. But assuming, for the sake of argument, that the Garabed may not develop as its inventor hopes, we will still have to depend upon coal. This—one of the greatest industries of the Nation—needs a readjustment and reformation more than any other great industry of which I know. We sometimes hear that the miners receive high wages, and at times they do; and yet it is a lamentable fact that even where the wages are highest, where men make the most when they are actually employed, the yearly wage is largely inadequate because of the fact that the employment is not steady.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER. I have but one minute, and I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DENISON. I yield the gentleman five minutes, if I have that much time to yield.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield a minute?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I do not.

The SPEAKER. What about the other gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not reached my discussion of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes, if I have that much time to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. In your hope of the attainment of proper regulations for the mining and distribution of coal and the distribution of fuel, it is evident, then, from your observation, that you do not attach any serious hope for the ultimate accomplishment of that much-cherished desire, by what is being done by Prof. Garfield?

Mr. MONDELL. I wish Prof. Garfield well, and I hope he will accomplish more good in the future than he has been able to accomplish in the past. [Laughter.] I believe he is making an earnest effort, and I wish him well in his work.

The solution of many of the difficulties surrounding the coal industry in America lies in storage. A great railway engineer was once asked, "What is the most important thing in building a railroad?" He said, "Drainage." "What is the next most important thing?" He said, "Drainage." "What is the all-important thing?" He replied, "Drainage." What is the most important thing in establishing a reasonably satisfactory condition in reference to the coal industry of this country? Storage. As far as coal is concerned, we mostly live from hand to mouth. We buy a ton of coal when the clouds are lowering, when the rain falls and the wind drives, and we expect it to be delivered within five minutes after we telephone our order. There never can be a satisfactory condition in the coal industry of the United States until the American people learn to store coal and to store it to an extent that will make possible the operation of the mines practically the year around. That will be beneficial in a thousand ways. First, it will prevent these winter shortages. It will give the operator a better opportunity to mine and sell his coal at a fair price and for a reasonable profit. It will give the coal miner a fair income, although his daily wage be not as high as under present conditions. It will bring the coal business to a normal, reasonably satisfactory condition.

Here is a proposition, in a small way, it is true, in one place, to start and to enlarge, as far as the Government bureaus here are concerned, the practice of storage. It is proposed that the Government, instead of buying a small amount of coal from time to time through many agencies, storing it in a great many places in small quantities, shall establish a yard or yards where coal purchased in the summer season, when the work of the mines is slack, and when the men need employment, when coal is comparatively cheap, may be stored. We shall then have a supply on hand in the days when there is a congestion of railway traffic, a shortage of cars; when the mines are pressed to their utmost in their production; when it is the most difficult to deliver and the price is highest. Even though the Government did not save a penny by this method of procedure it would be wise to inaugurate the policy proposed; but there will, in my opinion, be a very considerable saving in money.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to my friend.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would like to inquire of the gentleman what is the practical reason why the mine operator does not store at the mines? Presumably some financial or other reason?

Mr. MONDELL. It is practically impossible to store in sufficiently great quantities at the mines to remedy the situation. The conditions about the mines are such as to make it difficult. The cost would in many cases be prohibitive. Some kinds of coal can not be safely or satisfactorily stored in the very great quantities that it would be necessary to store at the mines. In the main, storage must be by the individual and by the individual industry all over the country, and I know of no better work that a man can do for his country, I know of no effort that could be put forth that would bring better results, than that of advocating and securing the country over the storage of coal, as is proposed in this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker, I think this resolution ought to pass for the reason that it will give, if it is found practical to establish a yard here, information as to the real facts in the coal industry. And that will be satisfactory to those who are not supplying the Government. I do not think it is going to bring a great deal of benefit to the Government in the way of prices, but it is going to educate in the practicability of operating and mining and distribution of coal, just as you have spent millions of dollars for other evidence that you had not at hand.

The last Congress appropriated $11,000,000 for the establishment of an armor-plate plant, and when they finally get that established they will find it will be at a cost of about $30,000,000, and that it costs them double the amount to make a ton of armor plate that they thought it would cost when they first purchased it; that is, if they keep books as to the cost. And we have gone along other avenues to discover facts. In this case we will take coal, for instance. I live in western Pennsylvania. All of western Pennsylvania and part of eastern Ohio is one great coal field, one stratum of coal under another, sometimes as many as three available strata. Every farmer who owns his land owns the coal under it. They are not operating. The trouble is to get the coal out. It is stored all right, but it is stored underneath the ground. They can not get the labor at the prices now being offered for the coal. The farmers would willingly take out coal in winter in order to supply the people if they could do so. And even though that supply is there we are suffering. But labor now at the mines is paid from $5 a day—common labor, out around the mines—to $15 a day in the mines. And even then they can not get the men to do it. That is the situation out there in western Pennsylvania. We are suffering from want of coal while living right in the midst of it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] has three minutes remaining.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes, and asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the business of mining coal is a very practical one. It requires executive ability and the capacity to labor with the hands and brains. Up to this year there has been no difficulty in the United States to any appreciable extent in supplying the demands of the country, the necessary fuel for the operation of the railroads, the manufacturing industries, and the domestic necessities of the country. Some time during the early summer last passed somebody conceived the idea that there could be an improvement upon the methods of producing and distributing coal. The result was that during the months of summer and fall, when every coal mine in the country should have been worked to the limit of its capacity, most of them were idle, waiting to see what the Government was going to permit them to do.

That is the answer to the present shortage of coal in every city and town of the country. In Pittsburg, Kans., surrounded by a great coal field, the miners were ready and anxious to work, but were not permitted to work for three months; those who were distributing coal were not permitted to distribute it. Operators were afraid to operate their mines and pay labor for fear they could not sell the coal at the prices it cost them to produce it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In a moment. It took the Government and Prof. Garfield until along in November to arrive at the conclusion that the mines of the country must run to meet the demand for coal. That is the reason why people have suffered and died this winter for want of fuel.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not also true that there was official discouragement of the purchase and storage of coal?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is one of the things the people were told by those in authority in the Government. "Do not lay in coal. Do not lay up a supply now. We are going to see to it that it will be cheaper when we get the management of it." Instead of getting it cheaper, the people have been obliged to pay more for it than ever before. Why, the people can not get it at any price. People have suffered and died in Washington, in New York, and every section of the country for lack of coal. They could not get the coal. They could have secured coal if the Government had not interfered with the operation of the coal mines early in the fall last year and prevented the production of coal at the time when it should have been produced to supply the necessities of the country.

That is the truth about it. What is the use of talking about coal and hardships and shortage? If you want to get at the reason for the appalling conditions that now exist, go back to last fall and find idle mines and idle miners and idle coal cars for months. There you will find the answer for the present suffering that exists throughout the country. There you will find the reason for the present high price and the impossibility of getting it at any price.

I have been trying to get coal for three weeks. I will pay $10 a ton, or $15 a ton, or $20 a ton, if I can get it, rather than have my family suffer. I can not get the coal; neither can you. Why? It has not been produced. Why? Because the mines were idle when they should have been operating. Why were they idle? Because Government officials said, "Do not buy your coal in July. We will get it for you cheaper next winter." [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment on the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FOSTER: Page 2, lines 6 and 7, after the word "the," on line 6, strike out the words "first Monday in December, 1917," and insert "first day of April, 1918."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, there were two other amendments sent to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 10, after the word "independent," insert the word "governmental," so that the line will read "and for delivery to all executive departments and independent governmental establishments in the District of Columbia."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendments and resolution to its final passage.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer another amendment, on page 2.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we have given sufficient time to it already.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, there is an additional amendment there.

Mr. FOSTER. It has not been offered.

Mr. GARD. It has been offered and is in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. Is not this the stage for offering amendments?

The SPEAKER. Of course it is; but if the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] prevails, that is the end of the amendments.

Mr. FESS. I do not wish to make a point of no quorum, but I will have to do it if there is no opportunity given to offer amendments here.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I sent to the Clerk's desk two amendments, and now call for the reading of the second amendment. Is not now the time to read it?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must rise in his seat and offer an amendment in order to get it before the House.

Mr. GARD. I transmitted the amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but that is not the way. The way to get an amendment before the House is for some gentleman to rise in his place and offer it.

Mr. FESS. I offer an amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] made a motion for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] to offer the amendment he sent up here.

Mr. GARD. I offer the amendment previously sent up, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 4, after the word "purchase" strike out the words "and supply" and insert the words "storage and distribution."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Speaker's desk an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FESS: Page 2, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "consolidating all matters relating to" and insert the words "establishing control of."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to this resolution. I am in favor of it. I think it is a wise piece of legislation. But those words that I am striking out are all inclusive. They do not exclude anything. They include everything. I insist that, reading it as it is written, we include transportation lines, bringing coal here to the city, and I am not sure that it would not extend to the operation of mines. It says "all matters relating to the purchase and supply," and if it includes distribution from the yard here to the Government buildings, it will under the same interpretation include the facilities for bringing it here. All the change I have made is that instead of "consolidating all matters relating to" I propose "establishing Government control of."

Then we will have control of the purchase and the supply. It is certainly not an amendment that is offensive to the resolution, but it simply proposes to clarify it so that the commission may have its limits within which to operate. As a friend of the resolution, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. The gentleman from Ohio fails to understand the difference between this resolution which limits this to only inquiry and a report to Congress, and not a resolution to establish a coal yard at this time. It is simply an investigation to determine whether it shall be established, and his amendment limits the right of this Bureau of Mines to find out all the facts.

Mr. FESS. Will the chairman of the committee yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does not the resolution go to the extent of taking in the distributing of the coal from the coal yard to the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. Of course. It would be of no use to have coal in the yard and not be able to distribute it.

Mr. FESS. How can you get coal into the yard unless you bring it there?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman wants now to limit the investigation as to the distribution.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman wants them to be limited, so that they can do just a few things. This is simply a joint resolution calling for an investigation and report. I move the previous question on the amendment and the joint resolution to the final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question on the resolution and the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FOSTER) there were—ayes 44, noes 20.

Accordingly the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Fess amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The ayes appear to have it, the ayes have it, and the joint resolution is passed.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet seeking recognition. I want to make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a perfect right to raise the point of no quorum. Does he raise it?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. HEFLIN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Chair had already announced that the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBBINS. I was addressing the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman was in time. [After counting.] Eighty-nine gentlemen present, not a quorum. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is this a roll call on the passage? There has been no division.

The SPEAKER. Yes; this is a roll call on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But there has been no division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair put the question, and really announced that the bill was passed; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] insisted that he was on his feet, and the Chair thinks he was. There is no question that this vote will be on the passage of the joint resolution. Those in favor of the passage of the joint resolution will, when their names are called, answer yea, those opposed nay, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 278, nays 39, answered "present" 1, not voting 109, as follows:

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Samuel T. King (H. R. 9902, 58th Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Respectfully, WILLIAM KETTNER.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Mines and Mining any further bill?

Mr. FOSTER. We have not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the call of committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees. When the Committee on Labor was called,

NATIONAL INSURANCE AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT, ETC.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up House joint resolution 189.

The SPEAKER. It seems that there is a special order in reference to these matters. It is as follows:

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, by unanimous consent,
Ordered, That when bills now on the calendar which are in order on Calendar Wednesday shall have been disposed of the bill H. R. 269 shall be in order on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. KEATING. I understand that, Mr. Speaker, but the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who is interested in the bill referred to in that order, is quite willing to waive his rights at this time in order that the Committee on Labor may present this joint resolution.

Mr. HAYDEN. That statement is correct, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 189, to provide for a commission to inquire into the advisability of establishing national insurance against unemployment, invalidity, and sickness.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Cox in the chair.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

House joint resolution 189.

Resolved, etc., That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the Commission on Social Insurance, hereinafter referred to as the commission. The commission shall be composed of five persons, to be appointed by the President of the United States, two of whom shall be employers of labor and two of whom shall be representatives of organized labor, the Secretary of Labor to be the fifth member of the commission and the chairman thereof. It shall be within the power of the Secretary of Labor to select a representative of the Department of Labor to act in his stead in any hearing or investigation in which the Secretary himself may be unable to participate, and said representative shall have full power to act in the name of the Secretary of Labor, but the position of the Secretary of Labor, as the fifth member and as chairman of the commission, shall in no wise be impaired, and in the report, findings, and recommendations of the commission his name and title shall be appended.

SEC. 2. That the members of this commission shall be paid actual traveling and other necessary expenses, and in addition the members of the commission, other than the Secretary of Labor, or his representative appointed by him pursuant to section 1, shall receive a compensation of $15 per diem while actually engaged in the work of the said commission and while going to or returning from such work.

The commission is authorized, as a whole or by subcommittees of the commission duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings anywhere in the United States; to send for persons and papers; to administer oaths; to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses and to compel testimony; to employ such secretaries, experts, stenographers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said commission is created; and to rent such offices, to purchase such stationery and other supplies, and to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary to carry out the purposes for which the commission is created; and to authorize its members or its employees to travel in or outside of the United States on the business of the commission.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the commission to inquire into the causes of unemployment; to inquire into the subject of systems of insurance, voluntary or obligatory, contributory or noncontributory, now in vogue to meet unemployment, invalidity, and sickness, and to what extent the Government of the United States may aid by establishing a Federal insurance system for the benefit of the wage earners of the United States when in need by reason of involuntary unemployment, whether the unemployment be due to lack of work, to disability arising by reason of sickness, or to the impairment or destruction of earning capactiy because of old age. If the commission shall recommend that a Federal insurance system or fund be established by the Government of the United States, it shall prepare and recommend the regulations that would be necessary for the successful administration of a national insurance system or fund, the amount of said fund, and the method of cooperation with existing insurance systems.

SEC. 4. That the commission shall submit, through the President, to Congress a report containing the testimony taken, its findings, and its recommendations on or before the first Monday of December of the year 1918.

SEC. 5. That the sum of $50,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the use of the commission: Provided, That no portion of this money shall be paid except upon the order of said commission signed by the chairman thereof.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the members of the Committee would like to secure a vote on this resolution to-night. Under the rule we have two hours for general debate. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE], the ranking minority member on the committee, will, I presume, under the rule, control one half of the time and the other half will be controlled by this side of the House.

This resolution was reported in the last Congress, in practically its present form, by the Committee on Labor. It was a unanimous report, and was made after exhaustive and very interesting hearings. The committee for three or four days listened to gentlemen who may be regarded as experts upon this subject. They represented every shade of political opinion. We had Republicans, Democrats, Socialists, and Progressives. We had actuaries, insurance commissioners, authors of books, and students of social questions. I think the volume containing those hearings is one that should find a place in the library of every student of public affairs. In this Congress the Committee on Labor, by a unanimous vote, made a second favorable report upon the resolution.

Briefly, the resolution provides for the appointment of a commission to investigate the entire subject of social insurance. The commission is to be named by the President of the United States. It is to consist of five members, two of whom are to be employers of labor, two to be representatives of labor, and the fifth to be the Secretary of Labor. The commission is to submit its findings to Congress.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I notice that the type of insurance is confined to unemployment, invalidity, and sickness. Does the word "invalidity" include death, or is death insurance excluded from this scheme? Is it the purpose of the commission to inquire into a system of State insurance for death?

Mr. KEATING. No; that would not come within the scope of the commission's work. The principal object would be insurance against old age, unemployment, and sickness. In Germany they have maternity insurance.

Mr. BORLAND. Invalidity, I suppose, would mean where a man was crippled?

Mr. KEATING. It is not the object to establish a system like the ordinary life insurance business.

Mr. Chairman, the United States has lagged behind other nations in the matter of social insurance. Germany has led in this as she led in rural credits. This country adopted the principal features of the German rural-credit system. That system had spread over Europe and other portions of the world before it was adopted by the United States. England, France, Germany, Austria, and practically every country on the other side of the Atlantic has some form of social insurance. The experts who appeared before our committee were agreed it was not possible to pick out any one of those European systems and apply it in whole to the United States. It was recognized that conditions in this country were so radically unlike conditions found in other countries that it was deemed necessary for us to fashion an American system. So it was considered best as a first step that we should appoint a commission which would devote itself to the study of all the systems now in existence and determine upon a system that was adapted to American needs, providing the commission found that any social insurance system was desirable in this country. The appropriation of $50,000, considering the importance of the subject, is a modest one.

I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, will he yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does this include anything about the Government establishing a system of old-age insurance?

Mr. KEATING. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. That comes under the term "invalidity"?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; that would come under that term.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, this resolution which has been unanimously reported by two committees provides for the investigation of a subject which has engrossed the minds of statesmen for nearly 40 years. In the last Congress the resolution came up on suspension day under a rule which permitted only 40 minutes of discussion and which prevented a complete analysis of the merits of the resolution. It required a two-thirds vote. We fell 29 votes short. The hearing to which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] has referred covers 317 pages of testimony of expert opinion, of statistical data, of a bibliography of the subject, and furnishes indisputable evidence of the fact that a great deal of literature has accumulated on the subject; that a great deal of knowledge has already been gathered; that the problem which presents itself to-day is how to assort the information now existing on the subject, how to coordinate the efforts made by students of the subject, and how to adapt social legislation to American conditions. The commissioner of insurance from Illinois, Mr. Potts, in the course of his admirable address before the Committee on Labor, made the following interesting statement. He testified on April 6, 1916, and this is what he said:

When the European war is over and conservation and salvage of humanity is supplanted for human wreckage, then the nations of the world will take rank and be measured by a new standard. The rank and standard will be determined by the nation's attitude toward its wage earners—its common people—its masses. All those traditional things which give a false rank and a false standard to nations must now give way to the establishment of a true national life and higher human betterment. National and industrial efficiency will correspond with the degree of efficiency of the people of each nation, and an efficient people can not exist in nations neglecting its wage earners—its common people, its masses—and social insurance is the one and only method of bringing to these people that efficiency that all successful and progressive nations must possess. If our Nation is to maintain a ranking position with the other nations, it must base its eligibility to its assumed rank by its actual ability to meet all other nations in national, commercial, and industrial contests, and to survive these tests its people must be as efficient as are contesting nations, and our Nation must begin at once to grant our people such opportunities and benefits as will permit them to bring self-standardization and the highest degree of efficiency.

The subject of social insurance covers unemployment insurance, old-age pensions, and health insurance. There will be a very serious disarrangement of industry with the termination of the present war, and the war is going to end some day. With the inevitable collapse of the industries now serving the needs of war, with the suspension of many a normal industry, the finding of a job will be quite a problem for many a man. Millions of men will return from the camps and from the battle fields to find their positions filled by women. There will be great difficulty in adjusting industry to the changed conditions, and then the evil of unemployment will present itself in its most acute form. The time to take up the preparation for that emergency and a comprehensive study of everything connected with it is now.

We should now accumulate the necessary knowledge, so whatever legislation we may be called on to enact will be based upon knowledge, systematized, sifted, analyzed, and brought up to date. There is a general impression that involuntary unemployment is an occasional or accidental thing. It is not so. Unemployment is inherent in the very system of production which characterizes modern industry. There are industries which from their very nature do not permit of constant employment, such as those which serve the caprices of fashion. It is impossible for a merchant or a manufacturer to predict in advance what demand there will be for a certain style of hat. To-day the women choose a hat that will look like a skull cap and to-morrow determine upon a hat that will look like a telescope. All seasonal industries give employment only part of the time.

The movements of labor incident to the removal of harvests means the shifting of men from place to place. Every new invention, every new machine, the application of a new method of division of labor causes a temporary shifting and disassociation of the man from his job. Every change in the tariff, the loss of a market, or the gain of a new one, a change in international relations causes a shifting of men and the separating of men from their jobs. Why, for that matter, competition among workers for wages can only exist on the basis of the presence of a large number of unemployed, ready to take for a lower wage and under worse conditions the places of those who are employed. So unemployment in its very nature is a part and parcel of the present system, which is no system, but chaos incarnate. It is not an accident, it is not an extraneous affair, but it is inherent and intrinsic, so far as the present system of industry is concerned. Thinking men should study the problem with the seriousness which it deserves. During the discussion of the little bill relating to the coal situation in the District of Columbia the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] brought out the point that the miners did not work during the summer; that the mines were idle and the miners were idle. If there had been a comprehensive method, if there had been a comprehensive system, if there had been somehow, somewhere, some one who could suggest to the Government what to do, we would have had the mines and miners working during the summer, so there would have been at all times a plentiful supply of coal and there would have been no unemployment in an industry whose product is always needed. In England they adopted some time ago an elastic system of providing public works, so as to increase the opportunity of the unemployed to find work in times of acute distress. Every industrial crisis means unemployment. Do you gentlemen know that the statistics of unemployment of 1910—statistics which were never assorted and published because they were so shocking—showed the presence of such a large number of unemployed that nobody dared publish the facts? Every industrial crisis brings with it hordes of unemployed, nor are these crises accidents. They have been recurring almost regularly every 10 or 15 years.

We had a crisis in 1819, in 1837, in 1857, in 1873, in 1893, in 1907, and 1912, because of the anarchy and chaos in the modern system of production. Goods are manufactured, not because the people need them at that particular moment, but with the object of sale at some time, the manufacturer taking the chance of finding a market at some time and of course taking the chance of finding themselves without customers to purchase their goods.

A permanent solution should be found. The long-tried remedies of soup kitchens, vagrancy, and poor laws are out of date and will not do.

The fact that we are at war should not prevent us from taking up the task. See what Germany has done during the war. In the course of the hearing Mr. Stone brought out the fact that Prussia, following the outbreak of the war, appropriated one and a half million marks, or $375,000, to be spent in combating unemployment through the construction of dikes, the draining of swamps, reforestation, road building, and so forth.

Notwithstanding the extraordinary expenditures called for by the war they found enough wisdom and enough statesmanship to take care of unemployment. If this contest we are now engaged in will not terminate soon, we will have a great deal of unemployment in industries that do not serve the purposes of the war and which are necessarily disarranged. Take the great ladies' garment industry of New York. That industry is to-day in distress because the average worker finds it hard, in view of the rise of cost of food, to spend the necessary amount of money for ladies' garments, and the industry is suffering. There will be a great deal of unemployment in other industries which do not supply absolute necessities.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONDON. With pleasure.

Mr. GARD. Can the gentleman advise the committee relatively what proportion of involuntary unemployment there is at this time?

Mr. LONDON. Oh, what I am looking into is the future——

Mr. GARD. I understand.

Mr. LONDON. I am not so much concerned for the present moment. I assume there is less unemployment, less involuntary unemployment now than at any time in the history of the country.

Mr. GARD. Is there any?

Mr. LONDON. I assume in some branches of industry there necessarily must be. Take an industry which manufactures luxuries, for instance. Whenever there is a crisis or whenever there is a sudden change in industry the first industries to suffer are the industries that supply luxuries. You can not transfer men from an industry of peace to an industry of war without causing some unemployment. It is impossible for a man who is working in an industry requiring but slight physical effort to transfer himself at once and adapt himself at once to another kind of work which requires a great deal of physical exertion.

It all involves a great deal of suffering. I am looking to the future and I speak for the to-morrow, for the day that is to come, of the problems that will be upon us. I have not attempted to present an exhaustive analysis of the subject. All I am trying to do now is to point out the necessity for studying the problem.

The same thing is true about old-age pensions. The idea of an old man, of a man who has been rendering useful service to a community, finding himself at the age of 50 or 60 compelled to resort to charity is a negation of the most elementary principles of morality. You wonder why the German people to-day stand so loyally by a detestable form of government. You wonder why so many social democrats have tolerated a form of government that is dangerous to the German people and dangerous to the world, and they answer that the German Government, as wicked as it is, was clever enough to take care of the old, to take care of the weak, to attempt to take the thunder away from the Socialists in the eighties when they introduced social insurance, when they introduced old-age pensions and pensions for sickness and injury, so that vagrancy and the need for charity have been reduced to the minimum.

I submit that the things that a feudalistic government could do in order to bribe its people so that they might consent to a continuance of it can be done by a free people in order to help build a free, great, and big nation. The appointment of a commission which will approach the subject with sympathy and with a desire to know will help us to understand the problem and to find a solution.

Several States have attempted to create similar commissions. There is such a proposition before the Legislature of Massachusetts, but the problem is in its very nature national. It can not be solved by the subdivision of a county or of a State, or even by a State. Industry does not confine itself to geographical limits. Commerce does not know State lines. Commerce and industry are national and international. The problems of unemployment, of old-age pensions, of health insurance, can not be effectively solved by a subdivision of the American people. They are national problems and of national concern.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE] would use a little of his time.

Mr. BROWNE. No one has asked for any time on this side.

Mr. KEATING. So far as the Members on this side are concerned, I will ask that the bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. BROWNE. As I understood the gentleman's proposition, it was to close general debate to-day and have the bill go over until next Calendar Wednesday and then have it open to amendment at that time. I therefore yielded up the time on general debate with that understanding.

Mr. KEATING. If that was the understanding, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. THOMAS. Are amendments in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. Not after the motion is made to rise.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution 189, to provide for a commission to inquire into the advisability of establishing national insurance against unemployment, invalidity, and sickness, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 10, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

THURSDAY, January 10, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in the midst of the world's great clamor for justice and freedom we pray that Thou wilt help us first of all to be just to ourselves, that we may hold ourselves to the highest standard, that we may appear before God clear upon Thy book, that our hearts may be right in Thy sight. If we are just to ourselves we know that we can afford to be generous to others. So do Thou mold us according to Thy will and enable us to bring ourselves completely into submission to the Divine will. To this end do Thou bless us and guide us to-day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have here a letter from a committee of citizens of Wilkeson, Pierce County, Wash., sending me a petition urging that aliens in this country be either drafted and made to serve in the Army of the United States or else that they be deported.

I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD, and also the body of the petition, because these citizens make some very pertinent suggestions and also give illustrations where these aliens have referred slightingly to American citizens and advised them not to go into the Army, and said, "We will take your jobs away and make the money."

There being no objection, the letter and petitions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILKESON, PIERCE COUNTY, WASH., December 15, 1917.

The Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will find petition signed by 210 citizens of this town. Wilkeson, as you probably know, is the center of Pierce County's mining district. It has a population of approximately 1,500 and boasts of about 200 voters. What is true of Wilkeson is true of every mining camp in the State of Washington with few exceptions.

We request the privilege of stating a few reasons for this petition:

We have a mixed population, consisting of Austrians, or people of Slavish blood in predominance, Germans, Italians, Finns, Russians, English, Swedes, and nearly every other nationality under the sun excepting Japs, Chinese, and Negroes. Some of these people have lived in the United States 10, 20, and in some cases 30 years, but in all this time they have not had enough interest in the welfare or government of our country to apply for naturalization papers. When you speak of the war they say, "Oh, you can go; I'm not a citizen." Yet when it comes to demanding higher wages and the best in the land—liberty, free speech, and still more liberty—they get it, and the American citizen pays the bill.

When the draft law was passed and the country called for men to bear arms, the best young American manhood responded; the rest claimed exemption—"I'm not a citizen of the United States; I belong to Austria, Italy, or some other country." Why not send them back to that country? The young Americans go; the others stay behind to demand higher wages and free speech, and they are not a bit afraid to tell you about it either—to hoard their money and send it back to the old country when the war is over.

Not very long ago two Austrians received their checks on pay day. They took them to the local bank to be cashed, and the banker counted it out in currency, whereupon they pushed it back and said: "We want gold." On being told that they could not get gold they refused to cash their checks, as currency would not keep very well in cans.

The town of Wilkeson subscribed $1,300 to the first liberty loan; the First Bank of Wilkeson took $1,000 of that amount. On the second liberty-loan drive a committee of citizens endeavored to make a better showing. They raised the magnificent sum of $9,050, exclusive of the bank's subscription. They received the large sums of $50 and $100 from men earning as high as $15 per eight-hour day.

Recently we undertook a Y.-M.-C.-A. drive for the boys in khaki. On entering a local pool hall we asked a group of Austrians to donate something to this cause. One man gave 50 cents, the others refused to give a penny. These men had just returned from a season's fishing in the straits and Alaskan waters, where they had netted from $1,000 to $2,000 each. They have their first papers but merely to enable them to fish. Ninety per cent of them stop right there; the other 10 per cent obtain their full citizenship.

The Government recently arrested in Seattle a man who at one time was president of the miners' local union at Wilkeson, a man who was loud in denouncing this country, a citizen of the British Empire. His arrest followed his connection with the Industrial Workers of the World. He was expelled from the boiler makers' union of Seattle and is now suing them and the Seattle Construction & Dry Dock Co. for damages and loss of work.

All the inhabitants of the town of Wilkeson send their children to our free public schools and use our free public roads, which is a good thing without a doubt, for which they pay not a cent of direct taxes nor share a bit of responsibility.

Recently while circulating the inclosed petition we asked a naturalized Slav to sign. This is what he said: "You bet I will. My countrymen make fun of me for taking out my citizenship papers. They say, 'What is the use of spending $50 to get your papers? If this country needs soldiers of your age, you will have to go. We will stay behind and get good jobs.' You bet I will sign, and I have some friends who will sign, too. We hope it passes and the Government charges each of these countrymen of mine about $10 a month to help win the war." You will notice on the petition how well he kept his word about his friends signing the petition.

These are some of the reasons we have for presenting you the inclosed petition. They may not be the reasons of all the signers of this petition, but we are sure they agree with a large percentage, and the petitions speak for themselves. We hope you may in some way be able to make these people appreciate the free country in which they live and their responsibilities to that country.

Very respectfully, yours,

L. G. MASTERS,
E. A. WESTFALL,
J. A. PYFER,
Committee.

WILKESON, PIERCE COUNTY,
STATE OF WASHINGTON,
December 1, 1917.

To the honorable Congressmen from the State of Washington, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned citizens of the United States, residing at Wilkeson, Pierce County, Wash., do respectfully petition the Representatives of the people of the State of Washington to use their influence at the coming session of Congress to have legislation passed compelling people of foreign birth working and residing within our country to make application for naturalization papers after five years' residence within the United States and for full citizenship within a reasonable time thereafter or be deported. And, further, that they be compelled to bear their just part of the taxes and responsibilities necessary to the successful conclusion of the war with the German Empire.

J. J. COREY
(And others).

Mr. JONES of Washington. I also have received a letter from Mr. Charles V. Powell, of Buffalo, N. Y., on the same subject, which I ask to have referred and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

721 LAFAYETTE AVENUE,
Buffalo, N. Y., December 24, 1917.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Thank you for your letter of the 18th instant, re my letter on "declarent aliens." Will you kindly consider the following points which are directly connected with this matter. I may state that I am an accountant, a man turned 45 years, British born, thoroughly American from my "shoes up," lived away in outlying section of Rocky Mountains, Colo., also Utah, for nearly 10 years, yet my handling about as auditor prevented my obtaining "final papers." I have a year to elapse; my wife is Swedish-French American, 26 years in this country. We are westerners. I offered myself to British recruiting mission because I was over American age, yet within British age. I failed to pass medical examination and was rejected. I have letter to that effect. No man ever called me slacker and "got away with it."

I tell you all this detail so that you will understand how unfair it would be to force such men as I back to England because we had not obtained our final papers, often not our own fault.

1. Look at "Citizenship" paragraph in the new draft questionnaire. Here the alien has to answer "yes" or "no" to the question, "Is he willing to serve United States Army military service." If "yes" he does not have to answer the following questions, or when and how he entered country, parentage, first papers?

2. Further down the page he is asked would he serve United States Army or army of his old country?

3. Now, Mr. JONES, here clearly is established a choice of service for your alien United States Army or old-country army. This means allied aliens, for nonneutral aliens affect the army question.

4. But, Mr. JONES, we are told that the reciprocal treaties are to be laid before the Senate for ratification. This means exchange of subjects between England and America in particular. Now, your questionnaire give the allied aliens choice of service clearly—"Which army do you prefer?" How do you reconcile the questionnaire choice of service with reciprocal treaties forcing Britishers to their old country's army?

Yours, for America only,

CHARLES V. POWELL,
A very "sore" old Britisher.

The British recruiting mission has established offices in most of our principal cities in anticipation of you gentlemen passing reciprocal treaties to permit Britishers declarent, 18 to 45 years, to be drafted into the British Army. One officer told me that England "would not stand for" anything else. Since when, Mr. JONES, has England acquired the right to dictate the policies of the United States of America?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have here a great number of telegrams and letters from citizens of my State, as well as the citizens of other States, urging the passage of Senate bill 3235, the Federal farm-loan bill. I ask that one of the telegrams, from Mr. A. C. Townley, president of the National Nonpartisan League, be printed in the RECORD, and also another telegram, from Mr. Frank P. Cowing, of Maddock, N. Dak., together with a letter from a New England farmer. I ask that those three be printed in the RECORD and that all be noted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The telegrams and letter are as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., January 8, 1918.

Senator ASLE J. GRONNA,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Bill appropriating $100,000,000 for Federal farm loan banks has passed House. Will you not use your influence to bring it to an early roll call and vote for its passage? The bill is not all it should be, but it offers some much-needed aid to the farmers, and financial aid is imperative to relieve serious situation. Congress voted huge sums to help shipbuilders, munition makers, and others. The farming industry certainly is entitled to same consideration. Unless farmers get this help the Nation's food producing capacity will be handicapped. This may jeopardize our success in war. The necessity for relief is urgent to the Nation as well as the western and southern farmer. The farmers are watching this bill. All they ask is a square deal. We respectfully request you to support this most meritorious measure.

A. C. TOWNLEY,
President National Nonpartisan League.

MADDOCK, N. DAK., December 31, 1917.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

Your attention respectfully called to importance of bill to enable Federal land banks to continue business in spite of abnormal conditions due to war and private competition. Large numbers of farmers in this region have applied for loans. If unable to obtain them, will be forced to fall back on former mortgage holders. Any rural-credit work for the future would be badly discredited. It is a critical time to cause financial embarrassment to the farmers. Failure by Congress to make the Federal land banks workable will raise interest rates, discourage farmers, and lower their efficiency. Your support is expected, as usual, by the farmers in your district.

FRANK P. COWING,
Secretary-Treasurer Maddock Farm Loan Association, and Secretary Benson County Federation of Farm Clubs.

WESTFORD, MASS., January 1, 1918.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to send a word of thanks to you for the support of the Federal farm-loan bonds the other day in the Senate. I am an eastern farmer engaged mostly in the growing of apples. I have a letter to my Senator WEEKS, mailed this morning, wherein I expressed the hope that the limitation put upon the act by his amendment to Senator HOLLIS'S provision for the purchase of the farm-loan bonds, would be amended so that there might be an open door for us during all of 1918, 1919, and the duration of the war.

I outlined to him the peculiarly distressing conditions in which we country people find ourselves by the war and the way in which the governmental activities cripple us.

There is a profound feeling of loyalty in our New England country districts to the Government. We have given our help, our boys, and a lot of hard, unpaid toil this summer to increase food supplies. Yet there is the feeling that there ought to be relief from some of the conditions that are apprehensive to us.

We go into the raw-material markets for our fertilizers. We meet the powder makers. We and they use many of the same materials. We to grow our crops. They to make their explosives. They outbid us. No matter how high it goes, they will go above us.

They simply turn the high cost of raw material into the cost price when they settle with the Government.

We farmers can not do this. We can not get our money back in the open and unsupported market to which we must carry our food products.

In the labor market, powder men and bullet makers, constructors, and shipbuilders are all in the labor market bidding against each other, and all conjointly against the farmer. In this kind of labor competition we have no ghost of show. Not only does this competition make our entry impossible, but the bonuses that are paid to manufacturers and labor make it absolutely prohibitive.

Most all war industries have an open or implied contract with the Government for a guaranteed market, a stipulated price that includes any price for raw materials and labor, and a given bonus for accelerated production.

As farmers and produce growers, we have to do without any of these supports. The isolation of our units makes them handicaps to us in growing war essentials. Still more, lacking bonuses, we have to fight man-made penalties and the penalties nature exacts from us.

As farmers we see these things. There may be no way other just now than this crippling condition that the manufacturers of war material impose upon us. We are loyal to the core under this crippling by the city mills and manufacturers.

All we ask is for a fair chance for our working capital. This means not only our homes and what is dear to us in our domestic life but the continued supply of things to eat, and things to wear. What is more fundamental than food and clothes in this great struggle? Antecedent to bullets and battles, there must be bread. Bread, and always bread.

In the growing of these fundamental foodstuffs, why should next July find the doors of these Federal farm banks closed when we go there with the best collateral God and man ever made to get working capital—closed by the action of an arm of the Government?

It is bad enough to run up against the crippling action of the different activities of Government war work. But, why in the name of all that is intelligently patriotic, should the Senate arm of the Government make impossible for us to exist and work in the economic farm crisis that impinges?

Let me be concretely clear. I have a neighbor who keeps a herd of 38 cows. This milk is carried into Lowell, where it goes to feed a lot of families and their children and babies. He is having a very hard time in getting his fertilizer that he needs in addition to his barnyard manure. He has no help. He milks by electricity. His wife helps in the milk room, besides doing all the household cooking and work. Yesterday morning both were up at 4 o'clock. The thermometer was at 30° below. And an 8-mile drive to Lowell by truck.

This man and his family are doing this work, have their home because they have been able to rent $2,500 at 5 per cent. Mortgage note to be renewed at the expiration of every six months.

Savings banks and private individuals are calling in their mortgage loans. This same farmer will receive notice next June that his mortgage will not be renewed next June. Not at any figure.

The capital that is out in these farm-loan mortgages is finding a greater return in the manufacturing markets and construction, where there are guaranteed markets, guaranteed prices, and heavy bonuses from the Government. From the Government to bankers, millmen, manufacturers, and laborers.

This dairyman, when he goes to the local farm-loan association under the Hollis Rural-Credits Act, will be told that the doors are closed to him. That one part of the Government foresaw these difficulties and consequent hardships and wished to buy these farm-loan bonds so that fresh capital might be furnished to continue this fundamental war work. But that the United States Senate made it impossible to go beyond the fiscal year of June, 1918.

What will he think? How will he feel to see the foreclosure of his industry that is so fundamental to the carrying on of this war for a world democracy? The collateral that lies behind these bonds is better than any mercantile paper. The Government has stood behind the mercantile interests of the country with far less security in tight-money markets. The same arm of the Treasury has gone out in helpful, hopeful ways to the purely business men of the country. Why not on much better security and necessity. The way of patriotism lies that we farmers shall not demand the marketing of our farm-loan bonds just now. The liberty bonds must have the right of way.

The logic that makes it necessary to spend some of this liberty loan money for bonuses to stimulate production without its being stipulated in appropriation details makes it more than legitimate to take up these farm-loan bonds.

The bonuses are necessary, we farmers have no doubt. But in themselves they will never return to the Treasury Department.

With the farm-loan bonds it is different. If the Treasury Department takes them up there will be an interest of 4½ per cent flowing back into the Treasury.

If they are taken for 1918, 1919, or whatever period the war may last, there will be this interest return to the Treasury.

When the war is over and liberty bonds cease to hold the market, the farm-loan bonds can be sold by the Treasury Department. It will have a better money return than other money that it has used. It will have its original sum back, with added interest.

Of no other appropriation can this be said. Of no other appropriation can it be as truly said, "Life, and life more abundantly." For many a soldier. Perhaps for the Nation.

I have gone into these details because I must believe there is no Senator in the Senate at Washington, when he sees the personal and economic difficulties in which the farmers of our country work but will be glad to keep open the doors of our Federal land banks.

The pinch is growing tighter. The threat of loss of home and farm grows more ominous as the war lengthens. The day will come when private greed in its short-sightedness will withdraw all its investments from farm mortgages. Not because they are unsafe but because they can get more in the big, bonused war industries.

If that finds the farm-loan banks closed, because we took no heed of a common obligation, in the purchase of the best underlain bonds in the world, this war will collapse. Millions will then have given their lives in vain and the reality of a democracy fade in an autocracy.

We pray God that we may be spared this calamity.

I wish to thank you again for the loyalty you have shown in this purchase of the farm-loan bonds.

Sincerely,

LOUIS H. BUCKSHORN.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the committee was, on line 10, page 1, before the word "years," to strike out "ten" and insert "thirteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "limitation," in line 12, page 1, to insert the words "and shall include systematic vocational instruction."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of 13 years from January 1, 1918."

THE COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 168, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

CLAIMS OF SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 2052) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims, and I submit a report (No. 188) thereon. A similar bill passed this body in the last Congress. It has the unanimous recommendation of the committee and of the department, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill first be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all claims of whatsoever nature which the Sioux Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, which have not heretofore been determined by the Court of Claims, may be submitted to the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, for determination of the amount, if any, due said tribe from the United States under any treaties, agreements, or laws of Congress, or for the misappropriation of any of the funds of said tribe, or for the failure of the United States to pay said tribe any money or other property due; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims, with the right of either party to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to hear and determine all legal and equitable claims, if any, of said tribe against the United States, and to enter judgment thereon.

SEC. 2. That if any claim or claims be submitted to said courts they shall settle the rights therein, both legal and equitable, of each and all the parties thereto notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitation, and any payment which may have been made upon any claim so submitted shall not be pleaded as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as an offset in such suits or actions, and the United States shall be allowed credit for all sums heretofore paid or expended for the benefit of said tribe or any band thereof. The claim or claims of the tribe or band or bands thereof may be presented separately or jointly by petition, subject, however, to amendment, suit to be filed within five years after the passage of this act; and such action shall make the petitioner or petitioners party plaintiff or plaintiffs and the United States party defendant, and any band or bands of said tribe the court may deem necessary to a final determination of such suit or suits may be joined therein as the court may order. Such petition, which shall be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed by said Sioux Tribe or any bands thereof, shall set forth all the facts on which the claims for recovery are based, and said petition shall be signed by the attorney or attorneys employed, and no other verification shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, documents, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence, and the departments of the Government shall give access to the attorney or attorneys of said tribe or bands thereof to such treaties, papers, correspondence, or records as may be needed by the attorney or attorneys for said tribe or bands of Indians.

SEC. 3. That upon the final determination of such suit, cause, or action the Court of Claims shall decree such fees as it shall find reasonable to be paid the attorney or attorneys employed therein by said tribe or bands of Indians under contracts negotiated and approved as provided by existing law, and in no case shall the fee decreed by said Court of Claims be in excess of the amounts stipulated in the contracts approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and no attorney shall have a right to represent the said tribe or any band thereof in any suit, cause, or action under the provisions of this act until his contract shall have been approved as herein provided. The fees decreed by the court to the attorney or attorneys of record shall be paid out of any sum or sums recovered in such suits or actions, and no part of such fees shall be taken from any money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to such tribe or bands of Indians in whose behalf the suit is brought unless specifically authorized in the contract approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior as herein provided: Provided, That in no case shall the fees decreed by said court amount to more than 10 per cent of the amount of the judgment recovered in such cause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the committee was, in section 2, page 2, line 21, after the word "tribe," to insert "or any other tribe or band of Indians."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims, and for other purposes."

CONSIDERATION OF TREATIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further bills or joint resolutions? If not, concurrent and other resolutions are in order. If there be no resolutions, the morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is on the table a resolution coming over from yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order is that when called for such resolutions shall be handed down, which the Chair does at the request of the Senator from Idaho.

The resolution (S. Res. 178) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and the same is hereby, directed to prepare a revision of the rules of the Senate relating to the consideration of treaties so as to provide that all treaties hereafter shall be considered in the open executive sessions of the Senate, and, when such revision is so prepared, to report the same to the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] desires to address the Senate this morning, and I ask that the resolution may go over without prejudice to its present position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be taken.

AMENDMENT OF THE FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, may I not ask, before the Senator from Iowa begins his address, to have the conference report on the bill (S. 3235) amending section 32, Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916, first disposed of? If it will not take any great length of time, I should be glad to have that action taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma calls up the conference report heretofore submitted by him on Senate bill 3235, which wil be read.

The Secretary read the report (S. Doc. No. 160), as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3235) amending section 32, Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same.

ROBERT L. OWEN,
HENRY F. HOLLIS,
A. J. GRONNA,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
CARTER GLASS,
MICHAEL F. PHELAN,
EVERIS A. HAYES,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not had time to examine this conference report in detail, but I take it from the report as submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] that the only change made in the bill as it passed the Senate has been to increase the appropriation from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma if I am correct in that statement?

Mr. OWEN. The provision is that this amount shall extend to July 1, 1919, giving 18 months in which this legislation shall operate instead of six months. The system could hardly get into good running order in so short a time as six months. The language is:

Such purchases shall not exceed the sum of $100,000,000 in either of such fiscal years.

The words "such fiscal years" referring to the fiscal years 1918 and 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, Mr. President, it is proposed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase farm-loan mortgage bonds to the amount of $200,000,000.

When the bill was before the Senate, I called attention to the fact that it was simply a beginning of the requests that would be made upon the Treasury of the United States for the purchase of farm-loan mortgage bonds. From information which I have received from different parts of the United States, I am quite sure that the statement I then made was correct. Only yeserday, Mr. President, before the Public Lands Committee, we listened to a plea that as to all homestead entries on public lands of the United States which had been made one year before the passage of an act, which was to be introduced in the Congress yesterday, patents should be granted immediately to the locator. It was specifically stated that the object of the legislation was to secure title to the land, so that their owners could secure money from the Federal Farm Loan Board. Asked as to what amount they expected to receive, the question was not answered, nor do I believe that it could be answered. If it is to be, Mr. President, a universal custom that one class of citizens are to receive patents to the lands which they have homesteaded, all citizens should receive the same consideration.

Instead of this legislation involving an expenditure of $200,000,000, we shall find ourselves in such a position that we shall have to advance a billion dollars for this purpose. Evidently there is a majority of Congress that feels that this policy should be adopted.

Mr. President, if the Government of the United States were in a prosperous financial condition at the present time and its obligations were not growing by leaps and bounds, by billions upon billions of dollars every year, there is no class of legislation, paternal in its nature, that I should prefer to this; but what I am fearful of, Senators, is that our system is going to break down. The demands that are going to be made upon the Treasury of the United States will be such that, even with the immense resources of the United States, our financial system will be loaded beyond all reason and power to meet. I am fearful, Mr. President, that when the people understand this, when they begin to realize what will be required of them by way of direct taxation and also by way of bonded obligations, they will lose confidence in the judgment of the men whom they have sent here to represent them.

I notice that the bill to which I have referred was introduced yesterday in the Senate by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and I have litttle doubt that it will pass. I know that all of those who are affected by the proposed legislation have just as much right to expect advances from the Federal Farm Loan Board as those who already have the title to their lands. I was told by one person interested in this legislation that it ought to pass, because while billions are being spent for other purposes, we also can add billions for this purpose just as well as not, and that those desiring the money are entitled to it. It may be, Mr. President, that they are entitled to it just as much as those who are to be beneficiaries of the appropriations covered by the pending legislation; but I know that the day is coming when a halt will have to be called. I know that we can not go on appropriating and authorizing the expenditure of money as recklessly as has been done in the last 12 months. I am fearful of the result, and I felt that it was my duty to say this much on this occasion. However, in saying it, Mr. President, I do not think that anything will come of it in the way of defeating this conference report. I do it because I think it is a duty I owe to my country.

I am not going to say anything more about the report; I presume it will be adopted; but I do hope and trust that Congress will at least stop and consider where we are drifting and what the result of these appropriations covering untold millions of dollars will be.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I agree with the general idea that we ought to be careful in our expenditures. In this particular case the farm-loan associations have applied altogether for about $200,000,000 in loans. The Farm Loan Board has been able to let out something between $20,000,000 and $30,000,000 of loans. After this system was inaugurated the United States entered into this world war and has had occasion, of course, to call for very large amounts of credits from the country, so that the demands of the Federal Government have made it much more difficult and awkward easily to market farm-loan bonds, although they comprise a very excellent security.

In this case, however, the proposed legislation only authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, upon the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to purchase at par and accrued interest certain portions of the bonds, not to exceed $100,000,000 in any fiscal year. It is not believed that quite so much will be required, but it is necessary when men desire to have the loans made to have available somewhere funds from which these loans can be supplied; otherwise the need of the individual for the loan will be satisfied elsewhere, and the system itself will not operate or function as Congress intended that it should.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was under the impression that this bill merely authorized the purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury of not to exceed $100,000,000 in all of the bonds.

Mr. OWEN. Well, that was drawn for the current fiscal year, and it was amended so as to provide for the next fiscal year, because the current fiscal year will terminate on June 30 next.

Mr. KING. Do I understand the Senator to mean that this may go on indefinitely?

Mr. OWEN. No; not at all; only for the present fiscal year and the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. KING. I want to say to the Senator, with his permission, that I have received a large number of letters from various parts of the country objecting to and, indeed, protesting against this legislation. The letters, in the main, are to the effect that the writers and the corporations with which they are identified have loaned and are ready to loan whatever money the farmers may require; that they are being taxed very heavily by the Government in the prosecution of the war, and they think that it is very unfair for the Government to tax them, to take their money, and then to loan their money out to individuals, thus entering into competition with the corporations in loaning money to the farmers of the United States.

If this were to be a permanent policy it seems to me that it would be not only unwise but exceedingly dangerous and would be committing the Government to a line of policy that is not consistent with its functions, and, indeed, is in contravention of the functions of the Federal Government.

I shall vote for the conference report, but I shall do so very reluctantly; and I hope we may have the assurance of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma that no more legislation of this character will emanate from his committee, at least for some time.

Mr. OWEN. This request, of course, comes from the Farm Loan Board, who have been met with the difficulties which I have pointed out. I do not think it will embarrass the Government in the least, and it will afford a means by which to increase the output of raw materials—cotton, flax, and foodstuffs of all sorts—which are essential, of course, to carrying on this war. It is regarded as essential to stimulate the production of these materials and to carry out the policy which was laid down by the Congress of the United States in adopting the farm-loan banking system.

Of course, I appreciate that the banks and the mortgage companies that have heretofore loaned money to the farmers regard this system with some aversion. That is not unnatural, because lending money to farmers was a profitable business, especially in some parts of the West, where the farmers, because of the difficulty in getting credits, had to pay a very high rate, a rate so high that it really obstructed in a serious way the development of agriculture in the western parts of the country.

Those are the reasons which justify this amendment to the Federal farm-loan act, and I trust the Senate will give it its approval.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when this matter was first before the Senate I expressed my dissent from the proposed legislation. Perhaps I was influenced to some extent by the fact that the savings banks of my State are loaning money to farmers at 5 per cent, and want to continue to loan money at that rate. Not a single bond has been taken in the State of New Hampshire, so that our people have no interest whatever in the matter; but it is evident that the Congress feel differently than I do. The House originally passed the bill granting $100,000,000 for two years consecutively. The Senate amended it by making it $100,000,000 for one year. I voted for that, and I regret that the conferees on the part of the Senate have yielded to the House in this matter; but they have done so, and all I can do is to vote against the conference report, which I shall do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word more.

I learn from the Federal Farm Loan Board that 80 per cent of the applications for loans are for the purpose of paying loans that are already carried by other institutions or private parties. The object is, of course, to get a lower rate of interest than the farmers now are paying. I should like to see the farmers get as low a rate of interest as possible. That being the case, Mr. President, there is no necessity of trying to deceive ourselves by claiming that the advance of this money is going to increase the production of farm products in the country. At least 80 per cent of it is not going to increase production, because all the farmer will do is to receive the money and pay the obligations held against him to-day by some corporation or some individual.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Utah, I suppose the theory is that the Government will never collect either principal or interest. Is not that it?

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the theory of the legislation.

Mr. LODGE. No; not of the legislation, but that is the theory of the farmers?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I would not say that.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I must enter my protest against that suggestion, because, of course, that is not the theory of anybody.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator think that these loans are going to be paid, principal and interest?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely. The Government could not have a better security than this—not only the individual land, but——

Mr. LODGE. Like the irrigation bonds; they are going to be paid in that way, I suppose.

Mr. OWEN. No; not like the irrigation bonds; very different even from the irrigation bonds. The bond is secured by the individual land; it is secured by a group who have a common interest, and besides that it is secured by the common credit of all of the land banks.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if they are careful in making the loans, and the property is worth what the mortgage calls for, it is possible that every dollar of it will be collected, if enforced.

Mr. LODGE. If enforced; yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator knows, however, that an appeal has been made to Congress to let up on the collection of the indebtedness to the Government on the part of parties who have taken advantage of the irrigation law, for which I voted. Does not the Senator think there will be an appeal from the poor farmer, after a while, in this matter?

Mr. SMOOT. All that the Congress has done in that regard has been to make the payments extend over a period of 20 years instead of 10.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, at the end of 20 years I can not say what may happen; but I know that under the irrigation projects the advance of the Government is absolutely secure, because it covers irrigated lands, and those lands never will be worth less than they are to-day, and undoubtedly they will increase in value in the future.

Mr. GALLINGER. But does the Senator think that the Government will ever enforce its claim?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I rather think it will.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad the Senator has faith.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator any doubt that the Government is going to get its money back on these irrigation bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it will, as I expressed myself.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so, too; but the Senator answered as though he thought there might be some doubt about it. Can anybody question that those bonds are going to be paid?

Mr. SMOOT. I know what the Senator from New Hampshire had in mind when he asked the question. I know that some of the organizations have petitioned to be relieved of the obligation.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has been done.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been done.

Mr. NORRIS. But there has not been any relief from any obligation. Nobody has been relieved from the payment of any of those irrigation bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. No one at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think anybody has asked for relief. I have not heard of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator there have been petitions asking that they be relieved, but Congress has not acted favorably upon those petitions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. As far as the security is concerned——

Mr. SMOOT. It is unquestionable.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that we could not conceive of better security than those irrigation bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the security back of the Farm Loan Board bonds were as good as the security back of the irrigation bonds.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will permit me there, it is quite as good.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I have received reports in some cases already to the effect that the loans are not amply secured.

Mr. OWEN. The reports, I am satisfied, can not be true, because out of $200,000,000 of applications they have only granted about 10 per cent, and the board is very scrupulously careful about it. Besides that, if there were an individual case where by some accident of administration the lands were not quite worth the amount of the loan the mortgage is secured by the combined credit of all the land banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hail with great satisfaction the announcement as well as the statement made by the Senator from Nebraska and others that all of the irrigation bonds are good I have a number of constituents holding irrigation bonds in the Southwest that will be greatly pleased with that announcement. They can be had by the Government at much less than par, and I can get hold of them within 48 hours. We paid par for them, but we can not get it.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the Government reclamation projects, not the irrigation projects that have been started by innumerable companies with the view of selling lands, knowing very well when they began the project that it would not be successful. I will admit that there are a number of those.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator, then, is confining himself entirely to the Government reclamation areas?

Mr. SMOOT. Entirely so, and entirely to the $30,000,000 that the Government has advanced for the purpose of building these reclamation projects.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I have had a great deal of correspondence from former residents of the Mississippi Valley who have gone to these reclamation areas, and the conditions are far from ideal on the part of many of the farmers; and either amendments of the law or some changes will be required, or there will be great unrest, to say the least of it.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield, if to anyone?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from North Dakota rose first. I yield to him, and then I will gladly yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator from Illinois that I trust he will not have it understood that the bonds to which he refers are Government bonds or anything that the Government has anything to do with. The bonds to which the Senator from Illinois refers are private bonds, bonds of corporations or individuals, and I do not think that has anything to do with this legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I would rather have a farm in the irrigated country covered by some of these private bonds than in anything I have seen that the Government has undertaken to develop.

Mr. GRONNA. I could tell the Senator from Illinois something about these bonds. They are issued——

Mr. SHERMAN. I could tell the Senator from North Dakota a great deal about them, too. I have traveled in that country, and some of my clients have investments there. They would like to have their money back, but it is a glimmering hope. I have chased a great many of those rainbows in my time.

Mr. GRONNA. With the permission of the Senator from Utah, may I ask the Senator from Illinois a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Are the bonds to which the Senator has reference bonds issued by corporations?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; but they cover projects in the same territory in which the Government is endeavoring to lift itself over its financial fence by its own bootstraps, and it will meet with the same failure that individual effort does. The Government has no supernatural power of finance.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me now——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is perfectly evident that the Senator from Illinois, if he has ever seen a Government reclamation project, must have passed through it in a very hurried manner, and that he knows nothing whatever about the general condition of affairs on those projects.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I know far too much——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield, Mr. President, until I get through.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right; I shall be happy to have the Senator yield after the proper interval.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator speaks about the possibility of there being a condition of unrest on some of these projects. I have never seen any place where there was not more or less unrest. There has been a good deal of unrest in the city of Chicago. There has been a good deal of unrest in East St. Louis.

Mr. SHERMAN. And in Seattle.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There has been unrest in a great many parts of the State of Illinois, but we would not necessarily condemn such great States because some of the people are dissatisfied. No more ought you to condemn this great system of reclamation of arid lands, which is a demonstrated success, because some people to whom the Senator has talked have not found conditions to be ideal.

The same circumstances confronted the settlers of the entire West. All the pioneer country of the United States had its periods of hardships and difficulties to contend with; but they have gone on until they have added a good many prosperous and wealthy States to the Union, and wealth and prosperity will undoubtedly flow from the great majority of the Government reclamation projects.

There is just one other word I want to say in connection with my remarks, and that is that in my opinion there is nothing unreasonable in the application of these settlers for the extension of the time of payment of the expenses of the reclamation from 10 years to 20 years. My opinion is that it would be more reasonable, it would be better security, it would be juster to the settlers if the period were 40 years rather than 20 years, with a system of partial payments each year, which in that period of time would enable them to retire the principal as well as pay the interest without hardship.

That has been the experience of other governments which have had reclamation problems to deal with. They have discovered that men going into a new and entirely wild country can not begin making money the first year after they have put water on the land; that a considerable period of time must elapse before they can begin to get returns.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. The proverbial effort to extract blood out of a turnip is a profoundly profitable occupation compared with the Government effort to get crops out of a large part of the arid Southwest. The trouble is that where individual initiative and industry will not get anything out of the soil, a Government fiat will be equally a failure.

The most of the profitable territory has been occupied by private capital. The Government is now engaged, in the territory named, in an effort to attract, and it will attract, the same character of loans that the rural-credit system will attract. It will be loans that nobody else wants and nobody else will take. That is the kind of loans you are getting now. You can not deceive me on the farm-loan business. I know the territory covered by the applications for farm loans in considerable volume over the whole West and Southwest country; and the margin between cost and investment is so narrow that no conservative investor or bond house would loan the money of any client upon that particular security. The Government, though, being possessed of the endless resources of the taxpayer's pocketbook, can take chances where no sane investment house would do so. Outside of that it is business of that kind that this $100,000,000 is required to finance.

Why, the truth is that the average irrigation system, planned and executed by private undertaking, is successful where the right kind of engineers and people who know the country and have gauged its resources in advance have accurately estimated what kind of development is possible. All of those are successful. The Government has reached a water supply and has covered territory that private capital would not take chances on, or did not have the ability to develop, and has been successful; but it is a mistake to say that all the territories to be developed are good security. What the man in the Southwest and the West wants, what they want in the Mississippi Valley, where they are producing really the meats and the breadstuffs of the world, is not Government coddling. They want you to send them somebody that can help do their work, and on top of that can give them transportation and freight cars to get to market the millions of bushels in the western country that are now rotting in the fields.

Mr. President, commissions have come here, and advices from London have told the American people to eat corn meal, and we are eating it. We know how. It is a healthful diet. We are saving our wheat and our flour for our allies that need it. In one area in my own country, by actual computation, there are more than 10,000,000 bushels of corn still standing in the fields in the shock. There is not a grain elevator in all that magnificent corn belt that can buy a bushel of corn to-day, because they can not sell a bushel of it in the market. They can not get freight cars to reach it. The result is that all this soft corn—and the most of it in the corn belt is more or less frostbitten—is standing there, a prey to inclement weather; and if there should be an early wet spring before this corn is taken out of the husk, literally millions upon millions of bushels of it can be taken to the great centers, where I suppose the criminal grain man lives, and has kilns and drying facilities of all kinds to dry corn of this kind and to put it into food form, and in that way it can be used. But if it stands where it is, with no freight cars, it will rot in the fields, and the farmer in that country next year or the coming spring will not put in the full acreage of corn. That is the natural result.

What the farmer in this country wants is freight cars and hired help. That he has not got, and no measure of this kind will give it to him.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, let us get back to the conference report.

Senators must not be deceived and think for a minute that this $200,000,000 is not going to be used for the purchase of farm-loan bonds. There are applications now to take the whole of it.

In justice to the Federal Farm Loan Board Congress ought to express themselves at an early day by an amendment to the law creating this board specifically stating what the policy shall be hereafter, how far we want to go, and give the members of the Farm Loan Board to understand that they can go just so far and no farther.

Mr. President, in making that statement I know that I echo the sentiment of some of the members of the board. As it is, the board can not differentiate between one application and another unless after an investigation they decide that the security is not good.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator if they should not be permitted to decide the question as to whether the security is good or bad? Should not the board be permitted to exercise their wise discretion in determining that question?

Mr. SMOOT. They should be.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Do they? Does not the Senator think that after the board employs all of its machinery for gathering information regarding the value of the land upon which the loan is made that it is safe to indulge the presumption that the security is ample to make sure the payment of the loan?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a question of the payment of the loan that I am discussing now, nor the question whether the security is good. It is a question as to how far we want to go in this line of endeavor. The board do not know. They have applications now for $200,000,000 that they can not meet. The only way to meet them is for the Government of the United States to purchase $200,000,000 of these farm-loan bonds. I have no doubt, I will say to the Senator, that in the next six months there will be another $100,000,000, and within a year perhaps $500,000,000. We might just as well understand that there are about $4,000,000,000 of farm loans in the United States, and, outside of a small district on the eastern coast of our country, the rate of interest runs from perhaps 6 per cent up. Every farmer who is paying 6 per cent for his money and can get it for 5½ per cent from the Government is going to make the application.

In this connection I wish to say, in answer to what the Senator from Oklahoma said, that as far as the banks are concerned—I mean the banks that are in commercial business or in the saving business, and therefore for banking purposes only—in many cases it will be a great advantage to them if the Government of the United States will take the loans off their hands that have been running so long. But where there is a loan agent who makes his money by loaning to farmers, who charges a commission, and secures money probably from some individual somewhere in the United States, all he is interested in is to get his commission, and he naturally objects, but the objection does not come from the regular banks of the country to any great extent.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The sooner the money sharks are put out of busines the better for the farmer. The purpose of this act, as I understand it, is to encourage and assist the farmer in the development of his farm and promote the interests of agriculture generally. It is not an investment by the Government—the Government is not making the loan for the interest which it carries, but the loan is made to stimulate the farmer in producing all the things that grow in the ground—to encourage the tiller of the soil, make farm life more attractive, and in that way add to the material wealth of the country, and at the same time strengthen those moral forces which we find always among the sturdy progressive farming population.

The farmer has been the victim of the money changer for all ages and the purpose of this act is to liberate him and make him independent. The borrower is too often the servant of the lender. There is nothing more humiliating and discouraging than debt, and for that reason the Congress enacted this beneficent law that the farmers might be free to use their better judgment—work with hope and enjoy the products of their own toil. It was supposed that it would greatly enlarge his enterprise, and in that way reflect prosperity over the entire country. It seems to me that it is a very proper use of the Government function to render this assistance, if that will be the effect.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that is the claim which is made, and as far as 20 per cent of applications are concerned perhaps that will be the result; but I want to say to the Senator there are applications to borrow money upon property upon which money has already been borrowed at a higher rate of interest as far as 80 per cent of the applications are concerned. All the advantage there is in it would be to allow the farmer to borrow his money at a less rate of interest than he is paying to-day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator will pardon the further interruption, and permit me to say that the purpose of this law is to afford the farmer an opportunity to get from under the control of the shylock, who by sapping his very industrial life-blood prevents the development of his farm, denies him the comforts of home, and eats up all of his substance by demanding exorbitant interest. If the money which the farmer borrows from the Government at a low rate of interest shall be used for the payment of an outstanding debt upon the land and the improvement of the land and, in addition thereto, stocking his farm with a better breed of cattle, horses, hogs, and so forth, I can not conceive of a better use to which the money could be devoted.

As I have said heretofore that is the purpose of this legislation. As the farm is the substratum upon which all industrial prosperity rests, it is an inscrutable mystery to me how wise statesmen can afford to oppose measures of this character when they ought to know that the very class of people who object to the Government lending money to the farmer depend in the last analysis upon the products of the farm for their own material prosperity.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want to say anything further in relation to the report at this time, knowing that the report is going to be adopted.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, some observations have been made apparently with the purpose of discrediting somewhat or causing a lack of confidence in the farm-loan system as provided in the farm-loan act. I think it is wholly unjustified.

This bill is made the excuse for an argument of that kind and for intimations and claims that the system is proving unsatisfactory, and, as stated by some one, that the whole scheme is on the verge of bankruptcy. There is absolutely no foundation for that. The plan and system are working admirably. The system is a magnificent success. If it had not been for the war conditions there never would have been any need for this sort of legislation, and I do not believe now there is any real need for it. My own opinion is that these farm-loan bonds will sell throughout the country as rapidly as the people get acquainted with their merits. They will have to be somewhat pressed perhaps in order that people may be informed of their nature and their character and what they mean. I would guarantee——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Excuse me one minute, Senator. I would undertake to take the stump in this country from one end of it to the other and let any man on this floor go with me and offer to sell Government bonds, and I will guarantee to sell five times as many farm-loan bonds as he will sell Government securities, at prevailing rates of interest and terms. Now, the situation is one that simply calls for these bonds being placed before the public in a way that the public will know what they are and to have to some extent at least their merits made known.

The first issue of these bonds at 4½ per cent sold at a premium of 1⅛ cents without the slightest difficulty. No other bonds offered in this country except Government bonds have ever sold like these farm-loan bonds. They have sold in the district I know in which my State is located, composed of North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, as promptly as they were offered; the demand for them exceeded the supply; and the requests to-day for them are numerous. There would not be the slightest trouble about selling those bonds down there, and I do not believe there would be trouble anywhere in selling the bonds if they are known to the public and if there were not some reason for not pushing them. I can see what the reason might possibly be. The Treasury is in need of money. They have offered liberty bonds to the public, and the public has taken the liberty bonds very patriotically. They are offering now savings stamps and other governmental securities to the public.

It is possible that the officials in charge of the financial affairs of the Government think it wise not to put in competition with Government securities these farm-loan bonds, thinking that it would be better to have the money which comes in from the sale of Government securities to the extent named in this bill—$100,000,000 for this year and the same next—come out of the Treasury and take up these bonds by the Government. I do not speak as to that with any knowledge or authority. It is just a supposition. It is an absolutely safe, sound, and wise investment of Government money in these bonds. They will draw 4½ per cent interest, or, if they sell them at 5 per cent interest, whatever rate they draw the Government will get.

It is perfectly ridiculous to intimate here that there is any idea or possibility under this law for the farmers who borrowed money to escape the payment of principal and interest precisely as they agreed to do. It would be dishonorable in the first place; but it is utterly impossible. No borrower ever conceived of any such notion. There is not a man who has borrowed money under the farm-loan system who does not propose to pay every dollar of it as it falls due. He will be obliged to pay it, and he understands that.

The people interested in this system are just as anxious to make these securities safe as the people who buy the bonds, because they know the minute the bonds become discredited in any way, or there is the slightest lack of confidence in them, that minute the rate of interest will go up and every man who borrows will have to pay an increased interest, because the bonds can not be sold at the low rate of interest that they may be sold for when it is known that they are absolutely safe. Every man interested in the system is anxious that the bonds should be safe beyond any question and that they should be taken on that basis. The borrowers are composed of members of the National Farm Loan Associations. Each association must have 10 or more members, and the aggregate call for loans must be not less than $20,000 from each association before it is chartered. The property is submitted with each application for a loan. It is examined by a committee appointed by the National Farm Loan Association. An appraisal committee from that association appraises the property. That is checked up by an appraiser chosen by the Farm Loan Board, recommended by the bank of the district. That appraiser passes upon the value of every particle of the security offered for loans; and the law says that no loan can be made exceeding 50 per cent of the actual value of the land and 20 per cent of the actual value of the improvements upon a farm, and the loans must be made to persons who are engaged in agriculture and for the purposes set forth in the act.

There is no need of amending the act. There is no reason for the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that Congress ought to outline to the Farm Loan Board to what extent they should make loans and for what purposes. The act is plain and definite upon that point. One of the purposes is to pay off existing liens; another is to improve the farm in order that production may be increased, and so forth. The act is perfectly plain. The Farm Loan Board have only to see that the money is used for the purposes named in the act, and each application before a man is eligible to secure a loan is based upon the provisions of the act and must set forth the purpose for which it is desired. So there is no need of any legislation there.

The only reason that I can see for this legislation is that those who are responsible for the financial affairs of the country feel that it is wiser that the money from Government securities may be used to this extent to purchase these bonds rather than have the bonds offered to the public in competition with Government securities. It is a perfectly safe investment. After the loan is made to an extent not exceeding 50 per cent of the value of the land and 20 per cent of the value of improvements you have the mortgage upon the land, you have the individual responsibility of the borrower, you have the guaranty of his association back of the loan, you have the guaranty of the bank and the guaranty of all the other 11 banks that the bond is safe and the security is sound. There can be nothing more secure than that.

Why, what are Senators thinking about? The capital invested in the farms of this country to-day amounts to $50,000,000,000, according to the latest estimate. The value of the farm products in 1917 was over $21,000,000,000. If that is not a basis for security of any sort, if that does not protect the bondholder where bonds are issued against mortgages on that kind of property, in Heaven's name where are we to find security?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to emphasize, as it were, one thing that I think the Senator from Florida has not emphasized sufficiently. I agree that he has made a very strong presentation of the safety and soundness of these securities, but there is one other factor in it that it seems to me has great strength, and that is the fact that every one of these mortgages is made by the men who form the farmers' association, and then in addition the property itself is held as a security for the bonds that are issued.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then if there is an overvaluation made upon one farm it means that all the other 9 men or 20 men in the association have got their farms hypothecated for the payment of the bonds. Consequently I can not conceive how there can be a loss. My fear at the time the original bill was presented was that the other farmers would not unite to hypothecate their own lands for the payment of every other loan that was executed in the association; but they have done it and they are willing to do it. They have confidence in their associates, and the bondholder does not take any risk whatever.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. I am glad the Senator from Colorado mentioned that. I thought it was included in the statement I was making, but it ought to be made perfectly plain that when these mortgages are sent up to the bank from the various farm-loan associations, having started from the individual borrower, each association not only sends to the farm-loan bank of the district the mortgages from that association, which have the approval not only of the local association but of the appraiser selected by the board and of the bank which has passed upon them, but all those mortgages are put together, we will say $500,000 all told in any district, and against those mortgages these bonds are issued. Those are the bonds in which it is proposed the Treasury may invest $100,000,000 under the bill. It is absolutely safe. They bear the interest that is specified in the bond, and beyond all question it is as sound a security as the Government could have under any circumstances for any money it may have in the Treasury.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if the bonds are not exempt from any form of taxation.

Mr. FLETCHER. They are exempt from every form, municipal, county, State, national, income tax—everything except inheritance tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to ask a further question. These bonds bear 5½ per cent interest on their face. Would not that be equal to 6½ per cent?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so. And more than that. The 4½ per cent bonds have sold at a premium of 1⅛ cents, as stated, and I should say that investment is equal to at least an ordinary loan on mortgage at 6 per cent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In that case, would not the public buy these bonds instead of buying Government bonds which carry a lower rate of interest?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the very reason I stated in the outset why I could sell more farm-loan bonds than any man on this floor could sell Government securities if the effort were made in that direction. I can see how that might be pressed so far that it would interfere with the revenue coming in from the sale of war scrip and liberty bonds and all that sort of thing, and it would be to the interest of the Government to derive this revenue from other sources and then invest it in these bonds to the extent named here. It is no favor to the farmer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I quite agree with the Senator from Florida. He is eminently correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no favoritism shown anywhere. There is no discrimination anywhere. This is an absolutely safe and sound proposition for the Government, and I can not see the slightest objection to it.

As I said at the outset, I do not really see the necessity for it. If proper effort were made to sell these bonds, I believe they would be sold. I can fully understand how the applications now mount up to a considerable sum, but I rather commend the Farm Loan Board for taking time to see that every borrower lives up to and complies with the law. In making the system absolutely safe, let them take enough time to do that. There is no need to hurry so fast that chances are taken or risks unnecessarily run. For that reason, up to this time, the amount of actual loans does not perhaps equal what was anticipated; but, in my judgment, that is simply an evidence of the caution and care of the board. Perhaps sometimes there have been unnecessary delays, but it is all the more commendable, so far as they are concerned, that they are exercising such care and caution. I think the conferees on the part of the Senate acted wisely when they receded from the action taken by the Senate and in yielding to the House.

I shall, of course, support the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. KENYON obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I know there are several friends of rural credits who would like to speak on this conference report, but I am sure they will forego that pleasure if the Senator from Iowa will merely let us vote on the matter now.

Mr. KENYON. I was going to make my remarks on the conference report; but, of course, if there can be a vote now taken upon it, I shall not do so.

Mr. HOLLIS I think no other Senator will insist upon speaking on the conference report, and that we can get it out of the way. I ask that we may have a vote.

Mr. KENYON. I want to be accommodating, and if the Senator from New Hampshire will guarantee that there may be a vote I shall yield for that purpose. I am, however, compelled speedily to go to a committee meeting.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think I can guarantee that there will be an immediate vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PEACE AND THE WORLD WAR.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not in the habit of taking up much of the time of the Senate, but in view of the peace propaganda that is now spreading to some extent throughout the world I want to make a few observations about war conditions and about peace.

There has been a sort of monopoly of the Lord and His utterances by the Kaiser; but in reference to the peace which he is now attempting to bring to the world there are some things in the Holy Scriptures, familiar, of course, to all of you, but which I feel at liberty to point out, and which, it seems to me, are very applicable to his situation. The old prophet Isaiah said:

> The way of peace they know not; and there is no judgment in their goings; they have made them crooked paths; whosoever goeth therein shall not know peace. (Isaiah lix, 8.)

And in Romans we find:

> Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips.
> Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness.
> Their feet are swift to shed blood.
> Destruction and misery are in their ways.
> And the way of peace have they not known.
> There is no fear of God before their eyes. (Romans iii, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18.)

Another passage in Ezekiel, which I commend to the Kaiser, who is so accustomed to quoting Scripture for his purpose, is this:

> Destruction cometh; and they shall seek peace, and there shall be none. (Ezekiel vii, 25.)

We have just passed through the season of "peace on earth, good will to men." Never before in the history of the world has there been a time when there was so little peace on earth and so much hatred among men.

In the last three and a half years probably 10,000,000 men have been killed in war. Forty million, at least, are now under arms. The war is costing the world $75,000,000 a day, and in a few years the war debts of the world will run into the trillions.

Staggering as these figures are, however, it is not a time for pessimism. Justice, somewhat delayed, is on its way to triumph; ideals are holding their place; and the world can rejoice that out of the turmoil of the past year at least one inspirational event has happened, namely, the capture of Jerusalem from the atrocity-loving Turks, and there is a firm resolve on the part of the civilized world that it shall never be returned to them.

Our Nation has loved peace and hated war. It has looked forward to the time when throughout the world "swords would be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks." It wanted no quarrel. It was willing that other nations should live and enjoy the best there was in life. It sought no territorial aggrandizement. America was content and happy itself and desired only the same for others.

The great Republic has learned, however, that it does not take two to make a quarrel. One person or one nation, determined and persistent in the determination, can always provoke a quarrel if the other individual or other nation has one spark of red blood within it.

Everyone had a right to disagree as to the wisdom of entering the war before we entered it, and to talk, work, and vote against our participation therein; but since we are in this war, and have undertaken the mightiest task the Republic has ever attempted, the right now does not exist to say or to do a single thing to make more difficult the accomplishment of the national purpose. Most of those who opposed the war, in a spirit of patriotism, I believe, now subscribe to the philosophy of Decatur, "My country—in its dealings with foreign nations may it always be right; but right or wrong, my country!" Our people have come to better understand the great purpose of the war. Many thoughtful men who hesitated long as to the wisdom of our going into the war, who honestly believed that we might have remained out of it, are now thoroughly convinced that they were wrong, and whole-heartedly are determined that the matter shall be fought through to a peace that will make future wars impossible. The time to have kept out of the war was before we go into it. Those who are now trying to help in bringing about a patched-up peace and lend their influence in that direction are weakening the American forces, injuring the country, and interfering with the preparation we must make. We have taken hold of this tremendous job. Are we going to see it to a finish, or are we going to dilly-dally and assist in getting some kind of a peace that will amount to nothing? We had better bear in mind the words of a German statesman who a short time ago, when Germany first became anxious about the United States entering the war, said that the amount of indemnity they would ask from our country would be something like $89,000,000,000. It will cost us more to lose this war than it will cost us to win it. They will need a better collection agency than ever yet has been devised to collect the $89,000,000,000.

Possibly, Mr. President, we could have remained out of this war for a few years; we could have indulged in our easy, money making, and selfish life a little longer; but eventually we would have been presented with the alternative of either going into war or submitting to a vassalage of Germany. Were we ready to give up the Monroe doctrine? If Germany conquered France and England and took a part of Canada, what would we do about the proposition? Were we ready to give up the freedom of the seas? Are the people of this Nation willing to give it up now, to acknowledge the right of Germany to say to us that we could send one boat a week on certain parts of the sea, provided it was painted like a barber's pole? Were we willing to recognize that "while the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof," the sea is the Kaiser's? We would sink below a second-rate power were we to give up the freedom of the seas. What would become of our merchants, our manufacturers, our farmers, if one nation were to be permitted to dictate the markets of the world by controlling the seas? And, pray, from whom did Germany secure the right to control the sea?

Thank God—and I have thanked Him more since I have witnessed some of the butchery of the conflict—we came with clean hands into this war. We did not bring on this war. We saw American citizens, women and children, go down in the Lusitania to a watery grave without a chance; we saw broken the promises of Germany made as to the future; we beheld the Sussex sinking beneath the waters wounded by a villainous torpedo; plot upon plot was conceived in the office of Bernstorff, the German ambassador; spies invaded our land; Von Zimmermann plotted against us in Mexico and tried to arouse the Mexicans by promises of giving them portions of our country. How much longer could we have stood this reign of intrigue and trickery? Yes; we could have kept out of the war on the same theory that a man can keep out of a quarrel when another comes into his house and slaps and insults his wife. He can run out into the kitchen, crawl through the window and out into the fields, like a craven coward; but that is not the American spirit. We had one alternative presented to us, "fight or run." The American Nation found itself. It was not too proud to fight for righteousness, just as now it is too wise, or ought to be, to make peace until the menace of Prussian militarism is ended.

We did not start the angel of death fiddling over the world, but we are going to have something to say about how and when the war is going to end. We had a distinct American issue, the issue that has been presented so many times, the murdering of our people, the closing to us of the seas. We had the opportunity to fight with the allies helping us or fight the battle alone. So it was a wise choice to fight with the allies. Who can deny this now? I believe the President's course was wise, although he was subjected to such severe criticism for waiting. He kept us out of war as long as he could, but when at last we were compelled to go in he had practically a united Nation behind him.

Out of this war, incidentally, there is going to be a greater respect for American citizenship. You remember the incident of Paul. When they bound Paul he said unto the centurion that stood by him, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman and uncondemned?" The centurion then went to the chief captain saying, "Take heed what thou doest, for this man is a Roman." And the chief captain was afraid after he knew he was a Roman, because he had bound him. So in the future when any nation attempts to injure an American citizen, wherever he has a right to be, that nation is going to hesitate, for it will be said, "Take heed what thou doest; this man is an American citizen, protected by all the power of the mightiest Nation of the earth."

There is a greater issue, however, than what might be termed merely the American issue. There is a world issue, and we can not divorce ourselves from it. We must be a part of the great world's work whether we will it or not. Destiny places us there. There are to-day, as has been pointed out, two great systems in the world struggling for the mastery—autocracy and democracy. One of these two systems must triumph. Both can not live and flourish. To make the world safe for democracy is only half. We must make the world safe for humanity. And in order to make the world safe for democracy we must do our part to see that the Anglo-Saxon race does not go down. Autocracy has been preparing for this contest for 40 years, while democracy has been sleeping. It takes some time to awaken democracy, but it is now thoroughly awake.

The German people have been taught that Germany is to rule every nation; that the voice of Germany is the voice of God; that God is a German God; that German institutions and the German system must spread over and conquer the world. I saw a poor Belgian, who had been a professor in a college, now a porter around a hotel in London, who said, "We pray to God and the Germans pray to God; and it looks as if God was a German God." The writers and thinkers of Germany have not hesitated to declare with becoming modesty that German rule is essential for the world. This self-constituted partnership, however, between the Kaiser as Emperor of Germany and the Almighty is going to be dissolved, and we are going to help do it.

I have some choice thoughts from German philosophers and writers, which I will not take the time to read, but I will refer to one from Pastor Lehmann. He says:

[Gems of German Thought.]

95. If God is for us, who can be against us? It is enough for us to be a part of God. (On the German God, by Pastor W. Lehmann, quoted in H. A. H., p. 77.)

Another great writer of Germany says:

[Gems of German Thought.]

116. There lurks in our people something of the God consciousness which inspired the Old Testament prophets. Very childlike, indeed, but of far deeper meaning than he could guess was the saying of a little boy to his playmate at the outbreak of the war, "I am not in the least afraid. The good God will help us, for he is German." (K. Engelbrecht, D. D. D. K., p. 45.)

I will ask, Mr. President, to insert in the RECORD other extracts to which I have referred, without taking the time to read them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

[Gems of German Thought.]

We thank our German Army that it has kept spotless the shield of humanity and chivalry. It is true we believe that every bone of a German soldier, with his heroic heart and immortal soul, is worth more than a cathedral. (Prof. W. Kahl, D. R. S. Z., No. 6, p. 5.)

96. We have become a nation of wrath; we think only of the war. We execute God's almighty will and the edicts of his justice we will fulfill, imbued with holy rage, in vengeance upon the ungodly. God calls us to murderous battles, even if worlds should thereby fall to ruins. We are woven together like the chastening lash of war; we flame aloft like the lightning; like gardens of roses our wounds blossom at the gates of heaven. (F. Philippi, quoted in H. A. H., p. 52.)

101. The German soul is the world's soul. God and Germany belong to one another. (On the German God, by Pastor W. Lehmann, quoted in H. A. H., p. 83.)

142. I look upon it as absolutely the deepest feature of the German character, this passionate love of right, of justice, of morality. This is something which the other nations have not got. (On the German God, by Pastor W. Lehmann, quoted in H. A. H., p. 79.)

185. The German must conquer; and when once he has conquered—to-day or in a hundred years—no duty is more urgent than that of forcing the German language upon the world. (H. S. Chamberlain, K. A., p. 33.)

Mr. KENYON. I stood one evening a little way below San Quentin, near the third line of trenches. It was a Sunday evening. I stood outside in the utter blackness of the night, just about church time in our own country. As far as you could see, the flashes of the great guns were visible, some of them 20 miles away, that you could not hear, others nearer. Rockets were going up from No Man's Land. I had read a book going over on the boat, called "Where Is God?" and as that scene unfolded before me in the blackness of the night, hell-fire literally on black cloth, I could not help repeating that question, "Where is God, that lets a thing like this go on?"

Germany, in her opinion, is in partnership with the Almighty. This system that she has developed is not one of advanced civilization, as we have been taught in the past; it is merely a system of the beast.

Germany is attempting to terrorize the world. She does not understand the spirit of the British or the American people. They know a "bluff" when they see it, because each one has tried it on the other so many times, and they are not frightened by bluff. Terrorism does not dismay them, especially when their cause is just. Can it be possible that the thinking people of Germany, if there are any thinking people left, believe that their conduct can bring about peace? Do they believe that the wild vaporings of the Kaiser as to the mailed fist are going to frighten anybody? They have left a reign of terror through Belgium and northern France; but Belgium, with only a little territory left, amounting to two or three counties, is not dismayed, nor is France.

A leading Frenchman said to me when we were talking about the Germans and their victory in Italy, "Better give up Venice"—it looked then as if they would take it—"better give up Rome, give up Venice; better give up everything but liberty." You can not conquer such a people.

I am glad, Mr. President, that in this great contest to make this whole world a safe place for ordinary individuals to live in we can help France. All of us, I think, feel pretty deeply on that subject. We go back to the time when France looked upon us as a little struggling Nation in the great family of nations, trying to struggle into the light. We needed help. They came. People stood at the old Liberty Hall at Philadelphia and watched Rochambeau as he went by with his troops to Yorktown. Lafayette came, willing to give up his life for this country. France cast its bread upon the waters a hundred years ago. Now, almost wrecked, bleeding at every pore, the great Republic comes none too soon.

The Rainbow Regiment happened to land in France—portions of it—at ports that can not be mentioned because of the censorship. I happened to see, a day or two afterwards, a gentleman who saw the landing. He said: "These boats waited for a day or so at the harbor; then they drew up to the dock, lined with boys in the American uniform," and that is a great sight. I saw myself three transports come in loaded down with those boys in the American uniform. "The people had assembled in this town. They all knew Americans were coming, and as the boats came up, one after the other," he said, "a band somewhere started playing the Marseillaise." He noticed a little girl with her mother on the dock trying to talk and her mother trying to explain, and he heard the words "Americaner, Americaner." Finally the little girl comprehended it, and she turned and put her arms around her mother, and, in French, uttered these English words: "Oh, Mother, they have come to save us!"

It is a great thing, Mr. President, to have part in saving a nation like France. I do not mean by that to have any part in getting back any territory to France. I do not believe we are carrying on war for that purpose; but, as a part of saving civilization, we are saving those poor people of France, and they look up to us as a poor, weak sister to a great, strong brother coming to save her. When this war is over, I have said before and I reiterate it, I hope this great, rich Nation will say to poor, bleeding France: "Keep all of the money we have loaned you. We ask not for the return of a single dollar."

I had occasion a short time ago to go through northern France. Wreckage and ruin were everywhere—inconceivable ruin. Herculaneum and Pompeii were never more ruined than some of these cities of France. Having done this, no wonder the Kaiser is willing to move out! No wonder he is willing to have peace! Count Von Hertling's terms, if I read them right the other day, were that, as to northern France, it was to be subject to the self-determination of the people there. Let the people of northern France determine whether they want to stay with France, with their men practically killed off, with the German intrigues and the German treachery and the German money that can come in there! Any hand that ever signed a peace treaty for this country that did not demand the restoration of northern France ought to be palsied by the Almighty.

On the remaining walls of the buildings of many of these towns are written the words, "Nicht argern; nurwendurn" ("Rage not; only wonder"). Cathedrals have been destroyed everywhere, and on the walls of some of them are written, "With the love of your enemies." They destroy the cathedrals and then wire to the noble troops: "On with God!"

In the case of the old cathedral at Albert, with the statue of the Madonna and the child Jesus—a beautiful cathedral before this war—even the Madonna was not sacred. It has been shelled until the figure of the Madonna reaches out at right angles, holding over the stricken town the little figure of the child Jesus. Yes; "on with God!"

I want to put in the RECORD another one of those choice gems of thought in that connection, by Prof. Kolb:

> We thank our German Army, that has kept spotless the shield of humanity and chivalry. It is true that we believe that every bone of a German soldier, with his heroic heart and immortal soul, is worth more than a cathedral.

Count von Hertling recently said in a speech that Germany was saving Europe from America. Saving it—what mockery! I do not want to indulge in any recitation of horrors or atrocities. I think there have been brought to this country stories of atrocities that are tremendously exaggerated, but the truth is enough. Matters that are subject to absolute proof are enough. Saving Europe from America—yes!

They have placed women and children before their soldiers in charges against the French troops. That is not a matter of dispute. They have shelled the Red Cross hospitals. That is a matter I am ready to prove. They have killed the wounded after the battles. Germany has lost its soul. Could a nation that had a soul permit such things to go on? It has no honor. It has broken every treaty made and every provision of The Hague conferences. It has observed no chivalry in the freemasonry of arms. It has killed prisoners, poisoned wells, carried girls away for worse than death. It has treated women as beasts. Along the highways of France you will see the fruit trees cut down. You will see in the little peasants' yards, what there is left of them, rose bushes destroyed—pure vandalism, with no military purpose. You will be told: "We are coming to a town now; you had better get out." You get out of your automobile and inquire: "Where is the town?" "This is the town"—nothing but cellar holes; absolute wreck and ruin. All that is left of one town, Fricourt, is a little board marked "Fricourt."

Rather than have the things come to our country that have been dealt out by the Huns to Belgium and northern France, rather than have the women of our country treated as those women have been treated, we had better die, every man of us; and we will die, every one of us, if we are men, before permitting it.

One man alone is responsible. He can sit in his splendor, with his entire family around him. None of his sons have gone down in battle. True, indeed, was the response of the Belgian woman to a German soldier chiding her about their lost country when she said, "I would rather have a king who has lost his country than an emperor who has lost his soul." It is not the Germany of the old days, of Schubert's Symphony, of Liszt, of Schiller, of Beethoven, of Goethe. It is the Germany of lust and murder.

Do we wonder at any cruelty when we know that the Kaiser, through his boyhood days and young manhood, despised his own mother?

What can be expected from a man who despises his mother? It is that same spirit that has permeated Germany—the spirit of the Kaiser addressing his troops embarking for China, when he said: "When you come in touch with the enemy, give no quarter; take no prisoners. A thousand years ago the Huns, under their king, Attila, made themselves a name which still lives in tradition. Do you likewise. Strike home, so that for a thousand years to come no Chinaman dare look askance at Germany."

This is the man who now wants peace, but wants his kind of peace. Will America nibble at his bait?

What a horrible heritage Germany is handing down to her posterity, if there be any posterity left! If one were asked to give his judgment as to the worst thing that Germany has done in the war, what could he say?

He who loved art and sculpture might answer: "The destruction of such magnificent cathedrals as Rheims, Arras, and others, shows the vandalism of the Hun."

Another would say: "Where could you find a worse atrocity than the bombing of Red Cross hospitals?"

Another would reply: "Ah, yes; that is infamous, but what do you say to the torpedoing of hospital ships, sending poor, suffering men, struggling even then for their lives, down to the depths, without a chance to escape?"

Another would say the worst thing that has been done was dropping bombs on defenseless women and children.

Others would protest that the taking of women and girls from Belgium and northern France, compelling them to work against their own country, and subjecting them to every kind of infamy, could not be exceeded in cruelty.

Another would say that the shelling of boats on which people were trying to escape from torpedoed ships reached the heights of infamy; and so the list would go on.

Among all the damning cruelties that have been inflicted by the Huns it would be difficult to pick the worst, but the all-dominating fact is that the very making and bringing about of this war is the worst fact in connection with it. It did not come spontaneously. It was not started to protect any rights. It came about through a system of intrigue practiced throughout the world, through a training of the German people that their mission was to subdue others, and that no one had a right to live without their consent. We are engaged now in teaching them that the people of the world propose to live without their aid or consent.

Germany and Austria are in a conspiracy against freedom. We have declared war against Austria, and it is well. Germany is assisting Turkey. No nation can be a partner of Turkey without being an accessory to Turkey's infamous crimes. We ought to declare war against Turkey unless there be some good reason otherwise.

America's part in this great contest can not be overestimated. The allies are counting upon us for tremendous things. The great problem of transportation is, of course, the most difficult for us, but it is a problem that we will solve. We talk of sending soldiers by the million, and we will; but we must realize the difficulties of this problem. We will solve it much sooner if all ambitions and wranglings are laid aside upon the part of those who have charge of the construction of our ships.

Ships, ships, and more ships is the cry of the hour. Our duty is to hasten. The Russian situation has added to our responsibilities. France is calling loudly to us for help. The saddest words this Nation can ever write, if it fails in this emergency by reason of delay will be the words, "too late." There are no sadder words in language. When the Savior in the Garden of Gethsemane asked His disciples to watch with Him and they went to sleep and, coming back again and again to them, the Savior said: "Sleep on now; it is too late." May no historian write those words as an epitaph for the great Republic. England was almost too late. Had it not been for the magnificent inspiration, courage, and wise statesmanship of one man she would have been too late. That man stands as the most beloved man among the continental allies, the Premier of England, Lloyd-George.

Peculiarly are the various forces correlated in this war. Infantry can do nothing without artillery, artillery but little without airships, airships do nothing unless they are transported across the sea. The peculiar relationship of artillery and airships is illustrated by an incident near Vimy Ridge.

Infantry can not be used without artillery. Artillery in this war is of but little use without the aeroplane. The great guns shelling day and night accomplish a purpose of course. The continual hammering destroys the morale of the opposition troops. The allies are putting over into the Boches, as they call them, at least five shells to one the other way. This would indicate that the allies are superior in artillery. But there is the aeroplane. When I heard this discussion about aeroplanes blinding Germany I did not attach the same importance to them that I did when I saw them floating above trenches, going over and making sketches of enemy positions and wirelessing back to the gunners. I might relate a little incident as illustrating that. At a certain place a great gun was under the hill and had to shoot up the hill and over to a German battery, possibly 4 miles away. The aeroplane hovered high. At the first shot of this great gun under the hill where they could not see the enemy the airship wirelessed back "100 kilometers too far." At the next shot "50 kilometers short." The next shot landed squarely on the battery. That would not have been accomplished possibly in hundreds of shots without the aeroplane. So I come back from witnessing some of those performances firm in my belief that with the artillery and the aeroplane we must win this war. The more aeroplanes we get the better, and the sooner we get them there to blind Germany the better. Ten thousand aeroplanes starting from behind the lines on a trip to Berlin would come mighty near nailing the Stars and Stripes on the flagpole of the Kaiser.

When you travel the ocean nowadays you realize that tremendous problem regarding ships. That includes destroyers, and I pause to say that we have done marvelous work with our destroyers. The captain of one of the great ocean liners told me that within three days after the American destroyers arrived it was noticeable in the submarine campaign.

Nobody can say we have not done anything in this war, because the record of our destroyers is a proud record. They are beautiful little instruments of the sea. They especially appear beautiful when you have been five or six days wondering what the submarine zone is going to look like, and you find them aside your boat some morning four or five hundred miles out from the Irish coast. They bob up and down, with the waves going over them. Those boys never sit down. At a meal they eat out of their hands. They are some of the unnamed and unknown heroes of this war, and they seem to have a new way of doing this. Instead of circling around as the British destroyers and the French destroyers, when they see a submarine they go right straight for it. There are chances in that; oh, yes; but they are swift enough and skillful enough almost to dodge the submarine, and the submarine has learned it. The American boys on these destroyers have put the fear of God into the commanders of the submarines. Let us increase the destroyers until wherever there is a submarine the destroyers will be after them and the sea will be rid of the most hellish of satanic devices pressed to completion by the devil's chief of staff, commonly known as the Kaiser.

In this era of criticism I pause here to remark that no criticism has been made of our Navy. Lloyd-George a few days ago congratulated our Nation on the splendid work of our Navy. Let no one say we have done nothing in this war. We helped to destroy the submarine. Our Navy is doing some of the most essential work of the war. All honor to the boys of the American Navy, to the work of Admiral Sims, and to the splendidly efficient Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels.

Our boys over there are doing splendid work. If we can not go over and fight, let us insist that they shall have everything reasonably necessary to their comfort. Heroes, all of them! Let it never be said that the great Republic does not care for the wives and children left behind, and may it never be that those boys over there when they shall come home, as most of them will, will ever be in want.

Now, I want to say something about this. It will not suit some of my friends. I have observed in the papers criticism of the drunkenness of the American soldiers and comment as to certain diseases. As to those diseases I want to say that they are less than a fraction of 1 per cent—less than the statistics would show of any large city in this country. As to the drunkenness, I am as good a prohibitionist, I claim, as anybody in this country. I am commonly and usually denounced as a crank on that subject. I hate the liquor business. I will hit it every time I get a chance. But I want to say to my prohibitionist friends, "Don't father the stories of drunkenness among our boys across the sea." I have seen church publications for which I have great respect setting this matter forth. It is not so. You may find here and there a drunken man in the Army, just as you might a number of years ago in the Senate. That does not condemn the whole institution.

I want to say to you, my prohibition friends, we prohibitionists have a job on our hands. It is the important job of getting constitutional prohibition in this country, getting the amendment ratified by the States. That is job enough for us. That is going to keep us busy. When we do that we have done a tremendous work along the lines of ending the liquor business. But for this war let us not make it harder for the men in command over there by accusing our American boys of drunkenness. There is a man over there, the head of affairs, who is a temperate man, a God-fearing, a clean man, a fighter from the word "go," no blower, no grandstander, just an ordinary, thrifty fighter—Gen. Pershing. He can look after that question better than you and I can here in comfortable chairs. Gen. Pershing does not want a drunken army. Gen. Pershing does not want a diseased army. Gen. Pershing is just as much interested in the cause of our Army and in the great fight we are in as you and I. Now, let us quit this and leave that matter to Pershing. I hope that is not treason to the prohibition cause, but if it is they will have to make the best of it.

These boys are there for serious fighting purposes. Up Vimy Ridge the Canadians went and took it in two hours of tremendous fighting. It is interesting to know that 9,000 American boys went up the hill with them, storming the German lines, and one of the first flags to be planted on Vimy Ridge was the Stars and Stripes, carried by a lean, lank Texan.

While the Russian situation is not to our wish, let us be charitable with the Russian people. They have done great work in the past. They saved the west line. Let us be thankful for what Russia has done and prepare all the more to take her place in this contest. We must bring to the western front 2,000,000 men and have a million in reserve. We must do it as quickly as possible. We must cut the red tape, stop quarreling over the kind of guns and like things, and carry this thing through on business principles. Is it not possible for each individual in this country to quit thinking about what some one else should do and resolve to do everything he can do? It is not enough to do our bit. We must do our best. Is it not possible for each individual in this country to think about his Nation and get rid of every element of selfishness? There is too much grandstanding and limelighting; too much telling what everyone else should do; too much patriotic posing, and not enough of sacrifice.

There is no reason for gloom. It took Great Britain two years to get on a firm war basis. We need not be discouraged. The British and French will hold the line until we can come; but come we must with all reasonable speed that we can summon. If our men are not there, properly armed, they will be a liability instead of an asset. Never again will this Nation be found in such condition of unpreparedness, and one of the best preparations for future trouble will be universal military training.

They are sacrificing over there. What are we doing over here? The people of Great Britain and France have gone to the limit of sacrifice. Have we even reached the point of feeling it? We need not worry about the spirit of our people. It is right.

The women in England and France are in the munitions factories, they are in every kind of factory, hundreds of thousands of them also car conductors, truck drivers, motor-bus drivers. They have earned, it is conceded over there by their conduct during the war, the right to participate fully in the franchise, and I hope that right is coming to them here.

We need not worry, however, about the spirit of our people. We must think of what they are doing and the condition they are in. I think I rode 15 miles along the battle field of the Somme with graves on each side. Up the hill at Verdun a great cemetery was so full of graves of the French that they had to add an addition to it, and on the Marne, where the German soldier is sleeping side by side with the French soldier, there are palms over the French graves, so there is just a great sea of palms. Those people have made the supreme test.

The patriotism of one section of the country is no greater than the patriotism of the other. We are united solidly for this contest. We are ready for sacrifice and will meet the test. Let us love this country as we would our mother. And what sacrifices we would make for our mother! Men of the East and of the West, of the North and the South, are brothers in patriotism.

Patriotism does not consist in attending banquets with seven or eight courses to argue the food conservation question. Nor is it particularly evidenced by rising when the orchestra plays the Star-Spangled Banner and then rushing to the telegraph office and wiring Members of Congress, "For God's sake, not to increase the taxes on those things that affect us." We must search our souls in this country. We must quit thinking about ourselves; about what our neighbor is doing. We must cease criticizing others unless we are doing more than we think they should. We must think in terms of war; marshal our industries; marshal the spirits of our people not to expect profits; nor desire to grow rich during the war.

It is not enough to do our bit. That is, I think, an unfortunate expression. It is not enough to do our bit, but to do our best.

America is responding splendidly; the great Red Cross movement glorifying the womanhood of our country, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, bring the little touch of home to the boys over there. And on the liberty loan the whole country has responded nobly and will continue so to do. Our business for the next year or two is war, and we will have to bend every energy of our being; every particle of our thought to that task. Let side issues wait. We will learn the lesson of thrift and economy. Congress should set the example.

In this same feeling of sacrifice I refer to a bill I introduced here for which I have received the usual customary denunciation of being a demagogue, a bill to reduce the salaries of Members of Congress. I do not know that it will pass. I am not here to argue that every Member of this body and the other body is not illy paid; but regardless of that, in this era of scrimping and sacrifice, what an example it would be to the people of this country if Congress would voluntarily during the war put its salary back to where it was before it was raised the last time. Oh, yes; we have lots of duties, of course, and we have children to educate, and all these things, and we can not live on our salary; that is the talk. Go across the water and see what they are living on. Members of the House of Commons receive $2,000 a year. We could do it if we would. It would be a great thing for this country. We have our meatless days and our wheatless days and sweetless days, and I hope "porkless" days in legislation.

Patriotism is awake in the land. It may not all be of the shouting kind; but ofttimes the deep, quiet patriotism is more lasting. We have shown it in every crisis in which our country was involved.

To-day the grandsons of the men who fought with Sherman and the grandsons of the men who fought with Lee are fighting under the Stars and Stripes, side by side with the tricolors of France, for the freedom of the people of the world.

Out of this war will come great things to our people. We will have no hyphenated Americanism in this country. Those in our country enjoying the blessings of American liberty, who are continually trying to harass the Government, who seem to like some other country better than this, had better go to that country just as quickly as they possibly can. If not voluntarily, be assisted there. It is not a time for partisanship nor politics and, may I say, it is no time for inefficiency in any departments of our Government. I wish in this spirit of nonpartisanship that pervades our country to-day we could have a coalition Cabinet, made up of the strongest men of the Nation. What enthusiasm it would bring to the people of this country if we had a coalition Cabinet, with Elihu Root and Theodore Roosevelt members thereof; if in some of the missions abroad the services could be utilized of such a great American as William Howard Taft. It is not injurious to the war that we have criticism. Honest criticism is helpful; honest criticism will help in winning the war; criticism helps bring out inefficiency, and inefficiency wherever it may be—in the heads of bureaus, in Congress, or in the Cabinet—must go, and the sooner it goes the better.

There is one thought that we should get into the German skulls—and it may take a surgical operation to do it—the thought that after the war the civilized nations of the world will not trade with Germany.

I had a State senator from my State down here. He had a pencil, which he was carrying, marked "Made in Germany." He cut off that part before he went to bed that night, but said he got to thinking about it, so in the night he got up and threw the pencil out of the window. That is the way the world is going to feel if this thing keeps up.

Who will buy German goods after the war? Who wants anything in their homes made by the same hands that have shot poor little children and women of Belgium; hands that have bayoneted women and carried away as relics parts of women's breasts? Who wants any utensils made by those who have carried women and children into exile; who have blown up the homes of the people in northern France; who have sent women and children down into the seas with the hellish torpedo and submarine; who have shelled boats in which people were trying to escape from their devilish work; who have let drop the murderous bomb upon hospitals where men were already living in pain; who have blotted out from the sky, contrary to all edicts of warfare, poor men and their families. Who wants anything made by the outlaw? Let her take her products to hell. That is the only place she should find a market. She has been such an ally of the devil that he might assist her. Let Germany know that the world knows her word can not be believed; that her treaties are nothing. She knows she can have no virile national life without commerce, and the civilized world will refuse to have any dealings with her when the war is over.

There is much talk in the world about peace. Yes; everyone would want an honorable peace. We are fighting for a permanent peace. Everyone would want the slaughter to stop. The world is weary of war. But how can there be peace? Can you sit down and work out a peace problem with a mad dog? Do you desire to sit down at a table and formulate peace plans with one who has been engaged in killing members of your family? You may say that while your family has been killed, and while death is the penalty for murder, it will cost the life of a sheriff or two to take the man. Hence it would be better to sit down and enter into peace terms. No red-blooded man would say it. When the Kaiser takes his bloody hands off of Belgium and France it will be time enough to consider peace. The Kaiser is a multimurderer and a murderer in the first degree. The punishment for murder in the first degree everywhere is death. A million deaths would not atone for what he has done, but one is all that can be administered to him.

In traveling over the sea and witnessing the deadly submarine peril a few weeks ago, I could not help wishing that the Kaiser might be compelled to traverse the sea in an unprotected boat with submarines shooting at him every now and then along his course.

In the ruined towns of France I could not help wishing that the great palaces of the Kaiser might be blown up in like fashion.

In witnessing an air raid on London I could not keep from my heart the desire that the Kaiser might be placed where the bombs from the infernal machines could drop around him.

When I saw the trenches and the brave boys in the wet and cold standing through the night, I wished the Kaiser might be compelled to stand for days and nights in those trenches with the shells and the hand grenades and the machine guns popping at him.

If there is no hell, there ought to be one. It has been suggested that the Kaiser be turned over to a jury of the civilized world under an indictment for millions of murders, rapes without number, and let the jury of the civilized world pass on his cause before talking about peace. What would be the use of any Hague conferences in the future? What would be the sense of making any treaties? Do you want to sit down with the Turkish partner of the Kaiser, their hands dripping with the blood of the Christian people of Armenia, and talk about a righteous peace? Do we want peace by neglecting duty? Far be it from us. As a Scotch second lieutenant said to me near one of the battle fields, "Of course, we do not like this. We would like to go home, but we will fight this thing through, and the Kaiser has no more chance of whipping us than a celluloid cat has to catch an asbestos rat in hell." Good spirit those boys have. Peace, yes, but not with the Hohenzollern. When they abdicate we can talk peace with the German people. This Nation must be very careful as to the great propaganda now being started by Germany throughout the world to create a sentiment in every country favorable to the peace terms promulgated by Germany, which would, in fact, be a German peace. This is another gold brick. Let us beware.

In my humble judgment, nothing could assist Germany more than this present peace talk, and the talk likewise that Germany is exhausted. Peace is alluring, of course; no one wants to stand against it; everyone wants peace; but what use is an unavailing peace, and what would it amount to now? A mere expedient, requiring going over the ground again in a few years unless Germany should submit to disarmament. There can be no lasting peace without disarmament. Will Germany submit to disarmament unless Great Britain submits to giving up its navy? Does anyone believe that Great Britain will be willing to give up its navy? But the day must come when there shall be disarmament throughout the world if we are to have peace.

Analyze the terms of the attempted treaty to be made with the Russians. If Russia falls into this trap and accepts the peace terms, Germany will be stronger than she ever has been before in her sphere of influence. Russia is learning the lesson of German duplicity. No one can talk peace with a person not on the square, nor with a nation likewise. Germany is not on the square. In dealing with tricksters, beware. Germany is the greatest trickster of all the ages. Let us not be gassed at this time with peace talk. It is an alluring but asphyxiating gas for us. This is a time for resolution; for nerve; for firmness; a time to have our eyes open and our ears open as to the tremendous propaganda with which Germany is attempting to spread peace talk throughout the world.

We started out, so we were informed by high authority, to end the Hohenzollern reign, in order that the world might have permanent peace; that is our purpose. Let us plow that furrow straight to the end and not be diverted from it; let us not become wearied before we have started. Lloyd-George defined Great Britain's terms a few days ago, and the President later, with great clearness, has declared our terms. I do not believe, speaking only for myself, that our people would be willing to wage a great war across the sea merely in order that Alsace and Lorraine might be returned to France; but we need not cavil about that, because that is merely incidental to the main purpose. Our purpose is well defined—to end the menace of Prussian militarism. If out of that shall come Alsace and Lorraine to France, we will rejoice, but we are not fighting for that. Different allies may have different objects, and hence fight together without binding each to the particular object of the other. Our present business is clear—to help win this war; and all of these incidental questions can then be settled.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I want to say that we have a peace in our country. It is "that peace that passeth all understanding." It is a peace amid the roar of the cannon and the bursting of the shells. It is the peace that comes from the lasting conscience of America. It is a peace of mind, a peace of righteousness, a peace that comes to us because we know we are fighting to save worth-while civilization, for a civilization based on justice and not on greed, with that peace of mind which the military powers of Germany can not understand we war on.

America knows now why it is in this war. Our country knows that democracy can not be safe in America if autocracy succeeds in Europe. We learned in 1861 that this Nation could not be half slave and half free, and so we know to-day that the world can not be half cruelly autocratic and half humanely democratic. We know that righteousness and not ruthlessness must rule the world. There is a deep, set purpose in the hearts of our people to fulfill every obligation to the great duty that God has placed upon us. Loyalty, sacrifice, efficiency will win this war. In this contest of the allies and the United States, which the historian will regard as the most unselfish of all times on our part, to preserve the freedom of men and women throughout the universe, we rejoice to believe that there is no East, no West, no North, no South; a united people under one flag, marching on to the music of humanity; a people undeceived and unbeguiled by false peace moves born of German intrigue; a people determined that when peace comes it shall be a permanent peace; a people with vision enough to know that a peace now, without the destruction of the Prussian military machine, means simply getting ready for another terrific war. This people, devoted to peace, with the highest ideals of humanity, with the most unselfish purposes, knowing that no permanent peace can come by any arrangement with the present ruling class of Germany, fight on with determination and with their faces fully to the light.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question for information. Before doing so I wish simply to state that the Senator has made a very able, interesting, and instructive address, and one which, I am sure, has been enjoyed by his colleagues, as it will be appreciated by the country. The Senator has personally visited the front, as I understand, and in his address he has stated that in one gallant charge in a battle which I think took place before the declaration of war between this country and Germany——

Mr. KENYON. Just after that.

Mr. THOMPSON. There were 9,000 Americans who participated. Did the Senator learn, or can he tell us, without giving any confidential information, as to the number of Americans who had volunteered prior to that time for service with the allies and also the number who have gone to the front since that time?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator asks me two questions. I can not give the exact information in reply to the first question, and hence I rather dislike to answer it. The general understanding is that somewhere between 40,000 and 50,000 American boys were with the troops of the allies before we declared war. The number of our troops now in France I have heard estimated by very competent authority, but would prefer that the Senator secure that information from the War Department.

During the delivery of Mr. KENYON's speech,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will suspend a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of print paper at a fair price and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside until the Senator from Iowa finishes his address, when I shall call up the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. KENYON's speech,

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the appeal of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] that America should do her utmost in this war, of course, will be appreciated and responded to by every loyal man. I have myself believed—and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it—that, as a means of coercing Germany, we ought to take concrete, direct, positive steps to organize all of the world against Germany—the financial powers of the world and the commercial powers of the world, as well as the naval and military forces of the world. It would be entirely possible for the United States, through proper representations and through proper missions sent to the Republics of South America, to bring every one of those Republics into this gigantic conflict for democracy. We ought to organize the world together, so that the combined powers of the world that are against the German militaristic policy should serve notice upon the German people, who are backing the Kaiser in this war, that the whole world are defensively and offensively organized to establish liberty and justice and to fight the Hohenzollern ambition to rule the world by force to the death. To let the German people know the truth if they can be made to see it, and, if not, to enforce the rights of nations by the material, industrial, commercial, and military powers of an organized world. The psychology of this upon the German people now, I believe, would have a substantial effect in bringing about a realization in that country what the possibilities for harm may be if the German people continue to uphold the Kaiser in the making of this wicked, unwarranted, prearranged war, which has no purpose except the glorification and extension of the powers of his own dynasty.

SUPPLY OF PRINT PAPER.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of print paper at a fair price and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Arizona if he will not allow the joint resolution to be laid aside to-day? There are three examinations going on now by committees of the Senate. There are two Members of the Senate who desire to speak on this measure who are in attendance on those committees. They expected to speak between the hours of 12 o'clock and 2 o'clock to-day, while the committee stood in recess, but they had to leave even before the close of the splendid address of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. Inasmuch as an executive session is desired now, I will ask the Senator if he will not allow the Senate to go into executive session? I know of no other business that is to come up to-morrow, so we can take up the Senator's measure in the morning hour, and then go on with it for the full day.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, it is almost impossible for me to resist a reasonable appeal, or any appeal, from the Senator from Utah. My desire to secure early action on this measure is, as I have heretofore suggested, largely personal. I have the joint resolution under charge. If I could leave it to other hands, I would not press it to a vote at any particular time; but I feel that it is necessary for me to get away from Washington, and I will have to get away as quickly as I possibly can.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I am safe in saying to the Senator that the joint resolution will pass before the end of the week.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If I could be certain that I could get this joint resolution through——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I want to make a statement before the colleague of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] modifies what he has stated. If I could obtain a vote on the joint resolution, or if I could to-day obtain unanimous consent for a final disposition of the measure, I would be glad to yield for an executive session. Of course, an agreement to vote on the joint resolution would involve the adoption or the voting down of the amendments which I have suggested. The amendments, as Senators know without my telling, have been suggested very largely on my own initiative, because in many particulars I have thought the joint resolution had gone further in the direction of seizure of property or the products of property than it ought to go, and, accordingly, the amendments I have offered have been due to an effort on my part, after consultation with the one man on the Federal Trade Board who knew more about the subject than I or anybody else, to liberalize the measure to the point of making no seizure, and probably none would be made under the amendments I have proposed.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator that I do not think there is going to be any particular discussion upon the amendments the Senator has offered. The remarks that were to be made were to be made upon the joint resolution itself.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On the principle of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; on the principle of the joint resolution. I do not want now to have the Senators who desire to speak called from the committees on which they are in attendance. The Senator realizes the urgent necessity of those hearings coming to a close as soon as possible.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I appreciate that very fully. I should like to ask the leader of the majority, my friend, the Senator from Virginia, if he knows of any probability of this joint resolution being displaced by any other important matters in the Senate?

Mr. MARTIN. I am very sure that there will be no attempt to displace the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I will vote with him at any time against any proposition to displace it as the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is perfectly satisfactory to me. I yield for a motion for an executive session, with the understanding that the joint resolution remains the unfinished business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 11, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 10, 1918.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. William A. Sunday, evangelist, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee and rejoice that through faith in Thee and Thy word this Government was built upon that foundation. We thank Thee that the compact signed in the cabin of the Mayflower by our ancestors was for democracy, liberty, freedom, and the right to worship Thee according to the dictates of our own conscience. We thank Thee that as a Nation we have the courage to proclaim to the world our continued belief in Thee by stamping on our coins the inscription "In God we trust." We thank Thee that we are Americans and live beneath the protecting folds of the Stars and Stripes. We thank Thee that Thou canst look over the battlements of glory on our land and see that there is not one stain on any star or stripe in Old Glory. We thank Thee for our happy homes. We thank Thee for our wives and little ones. We thank Thee for the fruitful trees and bountiful harvests. We thank Thee that as a Nation we have never gone to bed hungry nor scraped the bottom of our flour barrel, and we pray Thy continued mercy and blessing upon us. We pray Thee that Thou wilt forgive our transgressions and blot out all our iniquities.

Thou knowest, O Lord, that we are in a life-and-death struggle with one of the most infamous, vile, greedy, avaricious, bloodthirsty, sensual, and vicious nations that has ever disgraced the pages of history. Thou knowest that Germany has drawn from the eyes of mankind enough tears to make another sea; that she has drawn blood enough to redden every wave upon that sea; that she has drawn enough groans and shrieks from the hearts of men, women, and children to make another mountain. We pray Thee that Thou wilt make bare Thy mighty arm and beat back that great pack of hungry, wolfish Huns, whose fangs drip with blood and gore. We pray Thee that the stars in their courses and the winds and waves may fight against them.

We pray Thee that Thou wilt bless our beloved President and give him strength of mind and body and courage of heart for his arduous duties in these sorrow-laden, staggering days. We pray Thee to bless the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy; and bless, we pray Thee, the Naval Strategy Board. Bless, we pray Thee, Lord, the generals at the head of our Army. Bless the boys across the sea, "somewhere in France," and bless those protecting our transports, loaded to the water's edge with men and provisions. Bless our boys at home who are in the cantonments. Bless, we pray Thee, the Senate and House of Representatives, and give them wisdom and strength, for they seem to have come into the kingdom for such a time as this. And Lord, may every man, woman, and child, from Maine to California and from Minnesota to Louisiana, stand up to the last ditch and be glad and willing to suffer and endure until final victory shall come. Bless our allies, and may victory be ours. And in Thy own time and in Thy own way we pray Thee that Thou wilt release the white-winged dove of peace until Thou shalt dispel the storm clouds that hang lowering over this sin-cursed, blood-soaked, and sorrowing world; and when it is all over we will uncover our heads and lift our faces to the heavens and sing with a new meaning—

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.

And the praise shall be to Thee forever, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a resignation from a committee, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 10, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House, Capitol.

DEAR MR. CLARK: Having been appointed a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I beg to submit my resignation from the other committees of which I have been a member, namely, Elections No. 2, Industrial Arts and Expositions, Reform of Civil Service, and Roads, under the exclusive rule governing such cases.

Yours, very sincerely,

J. Y. SANDERS.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. RIORDAN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Henry Metz, H. R. 14040, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. MCARTHUR, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the cases of Eda M. McCammon, H. R. 18641, and Mary J. Davis, H. R. 19580, of the Sixty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF A RESOLUTION.

Mr. EMERSON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, at the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, at the request of the chairman of the Military Committee of the Mayor's Advisory War Committee of Cleveland, Ohio, I introduced House joint resolution 122. I have been requested to withdraw that resolution. It is in relation to the service flag. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that resolution.

The SPEAKER. It does not have to have unanimous consent. It is withdrawn.

The Chair wants to admonish the galleries that they are here by courtesy of the House. They are not here to help conduct the business of the House, and it is against the rules for them to show any signs of assent or dissent by applause or otherwise. If I catch anybody violating that rule, I will clear the part of the gallery where they are. [Applause.]

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 215 (H. Rept. 236).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 200. There shall be not exceeding four hours' general debate, to be divided between those favoring and those opposing the resolution, but such general debate shall be concluded at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. At the conclusion of such general debate the resolution shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. Whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage, without any intervening motion, except one motion to recommit: Provided, That all debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Florida rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There was some confusion in the Hall while the resolution was being read and I did not hear how many hours were given to general debate.

The SPEAKER. Four.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], the ranking minority member of the committee, I take it, is in favor of the resolution now before the House?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to submit to the gentleman from Illinois a suggestion that we might agree upon time upon the rule. Has the gentleman from Illinois any suggestion as to that?

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that we agree upon one hour's time on the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Can we not agree to adopt the rule without debate and let the time that would be devoted to the discussion on the rule go to the general discussion of the proposition before the body? In other words, my suggestion is this, amplified a little: That we have no roll calls in connection with the adoption of the rule or the previous question. Let it be agreed that the rule shall be adopted and that the previous question shall be ordered, and the time saved in that connection could then be devoted to the discussion and added to the time of general debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think, Mr. Speaker, that a roll call may be avoided, but the suggestion that there be no discussion on the rule comes after some arrangements have already been made with respect to the discussion. That will largely revolve around the main question, rather than on the merits of the rule.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Could not that time be utilized in the discussion of the main question? It would more appropriately come in in connection with the discussion of the main question.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Virginia will recognize that it is the custom on the rule to discuss the merits of the proposition.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is the reason I suggest that we add that to the general debate, and consolidate the debate upon the main proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. So that whatever time would be given to the discussion of the rule shall be given to the discussion of the main proposition. I suggest that there would be no practical difference.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. I notice that the rule does not fix any time for voting. That, of course, leaves it in the power of those in control of the measure to close debate under the five-minute rule at any time.

Mr. FOSTER. That is true.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask what the program is—how much time you intend to devote to the five-minute rule; whether you intend to have a vote to-day; and if so, at what time?

Mr. FOSTER. The intention is to have a vote before the House adjourns to-day, and I will say that when the resolution comes before the House I am unable to say as to what time the debate under the five-minute rule will be closed, but I apprehend that the gentleman who may be in charge of this resolution will give sufficient time for the offering of amendments under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GILLETT. Genuine amendments?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I think so.

Mr. GILLETT. I suppose it follows that any time wasted now in roll calls would either postpone the time of voting or would take so much from the debate.

Mr. FOSTER. It will.

Mr. GILLETT. So it will be better not to have any roll calls?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon the rule be limited to one hour, and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and that the time be controlled—if satisfactory to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]—one-half by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who is opposed to the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was not the suggestion made in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that debate on this rule be confined to one hour, half the time to be controlled by himself and the other half controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], and that at the close of the hour's debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the rule.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I did not quite catch how the time was to be controlled.

Mr. FOSTER. My suggestion was that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] who is opposed to the rule, be permitted to control one-half the time.

Mr. LENROOT. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] half and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] the other half of the time for the resolution? Is that the suggestion?

Mr. FOSTER. No; not of my own time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I could not consent to that.

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, if I may call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to the informal understanding in the committee, it was that he should control one-half the time, dividing it equally on his side between those for and against, and that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] control one-half, dividing it equally upon this side between those for and against.

Mr. FOSTER. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that that is satisfactory as far as I am concerned.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was not my understanding.

Mr. GARNER. That does not give the opposition any chance.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My understanding was that we were to have the control of the time in our own right.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] whether or not he proposes to let the gentleman from Tennessee control the time in opposition to the resolution?

Mr. FOSTER. That was what I first proposed.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] propose to yield half his time to those in opposition?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That, of course, is my purpose.

Mr. GARNER. If so, who is to control that time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. When it comes to the resolution, I assume that the tentative suggestion made yesterday will be carried out—that Miss RANKIN will control for the majority and that Mr. MEEKER will control for the minority, the opposition here. Upon the rule, any gentleman opposing the rule on this side of the House may have half of my time.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest that there is a distinction between the Democratic members of the Committee on Rules and the Republican members, in this, that all of the Republican members are for this proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, my impression is——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he thinks, and if the Rules Committee think, that four hours are ample time for the House of Representatives to discuss a great constitutional question like this?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, yes!

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Florida, I believe that two-thirds of this House have made up their minds to adopt this resolution [applause], and I see no occasion for discussing it a great length of time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, that may be true; but posterity has a right to know why this great fundamental change was made at this time.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to make one more request. Do I understand that the gentleman's request for unanimous consent goes to the extent of ordering the previous question on the rule, so as to cut out the offering of amendment to the rule?

Mr. FOSTER. It does.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida objects.

Mr. FOSTER. I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

A MEMBER. Division!

The SPEAKER. A gentleman can not sit in his seat and demand a division.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House providing for the consideration of House joint resolution 200 simply provides that there shall be four hours general debate, but that these four hours shall expire not later than 5 o'clock p. m. to-day. If it extends beyond that time, if the four hours have not been occupied, then it will close at 5 o'clock. I have no doubt the resolution will be adopted, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I believe I am entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How do I understand the time to be divided?

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House provides for 40 minutes' debate, 20 minutes for and 20 minutes against.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That would deny this side of the House any time on the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] controls the time for the rule and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] controls the time against it, this side of the House is without time.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I suggest a way that it can be solved. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts, the minority leader, is opposed to the resolution, and 20 minutes' time can be given to him to yield to Members who are opposed to the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will yield some of his time to this side of the House?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly I will; I had made promises for more time, but I will see that that side gets an equal division of the time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield 10 minutes to this side?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is settled now that I have 20 minutes under my control. Is that correct?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not understand that the proposition was that the gentleman from Tennessee should have 20 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am entitled to it under the general rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this does not go by political lines. The rule of the House is that there shall be 40 minutes' debate allowed on a rule where the previous question is ordered without debate, 20 minutes to the proponents of the proposition and 20 minutes to the opponents of it. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee was the first Member that arose to oppose the rule, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I deprecate bringing a constitutional question of this sort before this House, especially at this time, when all of our energies ought to be given to carrying on the war. This is not a war measure. It is said that it has been regarded as such in England, and that suffrage has been granted in rather limited form to the women of England as a war measure. It is a sufficient answer to say that there is now no suffrage whatever in England; that Parliament by successive resolutions has refused to allow any general election for four successive years and has extended their own term of office, because they did not want to go into an election in England at the present time, and certainly not into one into which an enlarged electorate is brought, unhinging the whole foundation of government.

I will not debate the question as to whether in a time of war women are the best judges of policy. That great student of human nature, William Shakespeare, in the play of Macbeth makes Lady Macbeth eager for deeds of blood until they are committed and war is begun, and then just as eager that it may be stopped, while the man, as man should be, is slow to enter into a quarrel, but, being in, knows that he must so bear himself that his opponents may beware of him.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that certain rights are reserved by the Constitution to each individual State, and that one of these is the right to determine what its electorate shall be. [Applause.]

I deny the moral right at any rate of any State to enforce an electorate upon another State. There was a seeming exception to that principle after the Civil War. There is now no such necessity as seemed to be upon the States then. It is a fundamental right of the locality to determine its own electorate. It is one that may have to be determined as to cities. There are now parts of some cities in which the janitors cast the vote and the clerks who live in the tenements cast the vote, while those most interested in the hundreds of millions invested there have no control over the business affairs of the town. The electorate is the foundation of local free government. It must often be determined by the local conditions as to what is the right thing to do, but it is certainly wrong in time of war, when our whole energies should be devoted to measures to carry on the war, that there should be thrown into every State a discussion on any such subject as this. It was wrong as to the amendment as to national prohibition, and it is wrong as to this, and I oppose the passage of this rule.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. Before he uses it I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL].

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, in the presidential campaign of 1916 I was Democratic campaign chairman for the State of Kentucky. For five long months, day and night, I gave the best that was in me, physically and mentally, and cheerfully gave several thousand dollars of my individual funds for Democratic success in my State. On the night of the election I was full of hope and eager for results. I was deeply grateful that Kentucky rolled up her biggest majority in 30 years for the Democratic ticket. When the returns began from the great States of the North and East my heart sank within me. State after State in the North and East, which we Democrats were sure of, rolled in big Republican majorities, and, as the night grew, these majorities against us grew until it seemed that all hope was lost. Nearly every big Democratic newspaper in the country, except the Courier Journal, conceded Judge Hughes' election after all of the man suffrage States of the North and East had reported their returns. Not, until the early morning hours came, was there a single ray of hope for Democratic success. Then there came a report from the West showing a Democratic victory, then another and another until our hopes began to brighten. State after State from the Golden West, where woman suffrage prevailed, sent in cheering victories for Woodrow Wilson and Democratic policies. When all seemed lost, the tide was turned from defeat to victory, and every Democratic heart sent up a prayer of thanksgiving and praise for the woman suffrage States of the great West. It was on the morning following the election that I resolved, as a Democrat, that I would take advantage of the first opportunity to show my appreciation of the women's vote of the West. That opportunity for the first time presents itself to-day, and I will return, in part, my obligation as a Democrat, by voting in favor of the woman-suffrage amendment now before the House. I would feel myself an ingrate if I did otherwise.

Woodrow Wilson, the President of the greatest Republic on earth, and the spokesman of the world for humanity and liberty, speaks to the nations of the earth because the women of the West by their ballot so decreed; CHAMP CLARK, one of the greatest champions of the rights of the people, presides over this House because the voters of woman suffrage States joined hands with the Southern States in support of Democratic policies. The Democratic Party of the Nation controls the legislation of our country in the Senate and in this House, and upon our country depends the safety and happiness of the world. Our party has taken this position of world leadership for civilization and Christianity because the woman-suffrage States of the West by their votes made it possible. This being true, then right and justice demand that those of us on the Democratic side of the House should stand by those States which have stood by us.

In taking this position I find myself in good Democratic company. Many of our most distinguished leaders in all parts of the country have declared in favor of the woman-suffrage amendment; nearly all of the members of the President's Cabinet have declared for it; the great Speaker of this House favors the amendment; the President of the United States is in favor of this Congress now sending the woman-suffrage amendment to the States for ratification.

It was my privilege yesterday afternoon to be one of a committee of 12 to ask the President for advice and counsel on this important measure. [Prolonged laughter.] Mr. Speaker, in answer to the sentiment expressed by part of the House, I desire to say that at no time and upon no occasion am I ever ashamed to confer with Woodrow Wilson upon any important question [applause], and that part of the House that has jeered that statement, before it adjourns to-day, will follow absolutely the advice which he gave this committee yesterday afternoon. [Applause and laughter.] After conference with the President yesterday afternoon he wrote with his own hands the words which I now read to you and each member of the committee was authorized by the President to give full publicity to the following: "The committee found that the President had not felt at liberty to volunteer his advice to Members of Congress in this important matter, but when we sought his advice [laughter on the Republican side] he very frankly and earnestly advised us to vote for the amendment as an act of right and justice to the women of the country and of the world." Now, you gentlemen on that side of the House can jeer that statement, if you want to do it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To ask if the gentleman will yield in order that I may ask him whether the President wrote that with his own hand?

Mr. CANTRILL. He certainly did write it with his own hand, I will state for the information of the gentleman. To my Democratic brethren who have made these Halls ring with their eloquence in their pleas to stand by the President, I will say that now is your chance to stand by the President and vote for this amendment "as an act of right and justice to the women of the country and the world."

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANTRILL. I decline to yield. Do you wish to do that which is right and just toward the women of your own country? If so, follow the President's advice and vote for this amendment. It will not do to follow the President in this great crisis in the world's history on those matters only which are popular in your own districts. The true test is to stand by him, even though your own vote is unpopular at home. The acid test for a Member of Congress is for him to stand for right and justice, even if misunderstood at home at first. In the end, right and justice will prevail everywhere.

This terrible war has made it necessary for the Congress to do many things which it would not have considered for a moment before the declaration of war. No one thing connected with the war is of more importance at this time than meeting the reasonable demand of millions of patriotic and Christian women of the Nation that the amendment for woman suffrage be submitted to the States. An affirmative vote to-day does not commit one to woman suffrage in the State in which one lives, but it is simply a vote to permit your State to say, through its legislature, if your State favors woman suffrage. Eighteen States of the Union, with 184 electoral votes, have already given women presidential suffrage, and several other States in addition recognize the right of women to vote in other matters. The question has reached such magnitude that it is deserving of being submitted to the States for final settlement. One of the chief arguments used by the opponents of woman suffrage is that women are unable to bear arms in war, but the fact stares us in the face that when the men who are bearing arms in France had a chance to vote on the question of woman suffrage they voted 2 to 1 in favor of the proposition.

If the men who are daily risking their lives in defense of our Nation in the trenches are willing to trust the women to vote as to their welfare, surely those who are fighting the war behind mahogany desks can trust the women of the land with the ballot. Gen. Pershing says, "This war is being fought by women; it is women who suffer and lend courage to us; women are the ones who will deserve honor for their aid in establishing democracy." No one asks for the passage of the Federal suffrage amendment as a pretty compliment to womanhood. It is urged as a vital, sound, tremendous step in putting every ounce of power that can be marshaled behind our country in its time of need. However bitterly in the past I might have opposed woman suffrage, in the face of the statements from Gen. Pershing, our great military leader in Europe, and of the statement from the President, Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, I would cheerfully support the woman suffrage amendment now. As the President states, it is a question of right and justice to the women of the country and of the world. The American Congress at this critical time must do those things which are just and right toward all mankind. Every single one of our great allies have given or are about to give suffrage to the women of their countries. We must do the same for the women of America, because this country, above all others, boasts of liberty and justice. What becomes of our boasted democracy when we deny to half our population the right to participate in the affairs of government? No man on the floor of this House will dare say that the women of America are not as patriotic as are our men. As Gen. Pershing says, they are the ones who suffer most. Justice demands that those who suffer most for the Nation should have at least some recompense for their suffering. The least reward that can be given them is to say that they should have a voice in the affairs of the Nation which takes away from them their fathers, brothers, sons, and husbands to bleed and die that democracy might live.

What answer can we give to the nations of the earth when we send millions of our men, the very flower of our manhood, to fight for democracy and then at home deny the very fundamentals of democracy to millions of our own women? What answer can we give when we spend billions of our wealth that the world may be free and then at home tax millions of our own women without giving them the right to vote on questions of taxation? What answer can we give when we give our all for freedom of foreign countries and keep in political slavery our own women? No, Mr. Speaker, right and justice will not permit us to do these things. The war in Europe is for the freedom of mankind in the centuries to come. This amendment here to-day is for the freedom of American women, which freedom has too long been denied to them. Let the American Congress catch the spirit of the times; let the lawmakers of the Nation catch the spirit of the men in the trenches who are upholding our laws with the bayonet; let the Members of Congress join the Speaker of this House and the President of our Republic in justice for American womanhood. Right, justice, liberty, and democracy have always been, and will always be, safe in the tender care of American womanhood. From this day on, let the men and women of America be equal and united, citizens all, for the common good of our beloved Nation and for the welfare of all mankind.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, for the present I object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, before addressing myself briefly to the question, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I may make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, for the present I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I suspected as much. That is about all the gentleman from Massachusetts is capable of doing. I shall say then what I have to say in the time granted and to be granted to me.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FIELDS. I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen shall have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on woman suffrage. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I hope this does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, a few hours for debate upon a question that will add 14,000,000 of voters to the electorate of the United States is a want of consideration of one of the most important questions ever presented to this House. The time ought to be extended for this debate or gentlemen ought at least to be permitted to express their views in the RECORD.

For the gratification of those most excellent women and men who desire the passage of the pending woman's suffrage amendment to the United States Constitution I would be much pleased to vote to submit it for ratification to the States, but my sense of duty and my loyalty to the platform of the national Democracy and to the principles of my party and obedience to the will of an overwhelming majority of the people I represent forbids that I do so. It is not because I have any opposition to women exercising the right of franchise that I cast a negative vote on this amendment, but because of the manner in which it is sought to be obtained. A restrictive amendment upon the rights and the liberties of the people of a State attached to the Federal Constitution can not be desired by any person who has given careful thought to our system of government and the basis upon which local rights and liberty rests.

There are various reasons assigned why the amendment should be passed and many why it should not be passed. There are many people who believe in the right of women to exercise suffrage who can not, so long as they represent the will of the majority of the people and oppose the desctruction of the rights of States, consent to the granting of suffrage by Federal amendment. Some contend that the mingling of women in politics would purify the electorate and make the Government safer and better. They may be correct. Others contend that such conduct would render women less modest and therefore less worthy of the respect of men, and at last produce a race wanting in that delicate refinement and feeling of sentiment that comes from the tender and confiding life of a pure woman, unstained with the gross and sinister methods of political life. This may possibly be true. It is most likely true that both ideas present a remote contingency and can not be of much value in the practical determination of the question.

Logically, no man can deny that a woman is entitled to all the rights and privileges, including the right of suffrage, that men enjoy; nor has man the moral right to determine whether it is best for women to exercise the right to vote or not. Women should be permitted to determine for themselves that which they think is best for them. For men to determine that women ought not to vote is to destroy the equal justice to which the sexes are entitled. The power, aside from the moral right, however, to make men and women equal at the ballot box under existing law rests with the qualified voters. The qualified voters are men, and women therefore have no voice under the Constitution and law as it exists in securing their own enfranchisement. It therefore becomes the duty of men under our dual system of government to determine the manner in which it shall be done, if they conclude it shall be done at all. There are two methods by which women may be entitled to equal political rights with men. One is by amendment to the Federal Constitution, the other is by amendment by each State to its constitution or by its law if permitted under the State constitution to grant suffrage to women. A large number of the States have already granted suffrage to women. They have exercised their political power and sovereignty in the matter and determined in the interest of the rights of women. Other States might be of the opinion that it is not proper to grant this power to women. The proposed Federal amendment, if passed, would deprive the State of its legal right to determine its electorate. It may be said that the amendments that have already been passed to the Federal Constitution that are restrictive of the rights of States do also pro tanto deprive the State of sovereign power. That, so far as it goes, is true, but it affords no reason why the State should be further deprived of sovereignty, nor are the powers of which the States are deprived under the Federal Constitution essential to the maintenance of local self-government. The enumerated powers of the Federal Government under the Constitution are those powers which are essential to the transaction of the greater functions of government that are national in their nature. They do not restrict the States in the most vital function that enables them to maintain local self-government. When you deprive a State of the right to say who its electors are or place restrictions upon the State in determining the qualifications of its electors, you strike down absolutely and unconditionally the life of its sovereignty. The power that names the voter is the sovereign and the only sovereign. The man who assumes that there should be further restriction upon the right of the State understands not the principles of free government or the foundation upon which American liberty must rest. [Applause.]

There is no necessity for placing this sovereign power in the hands of the Federal Government. It ought to remain in the control of the States where it is, and a restriction upon it in any way or modification of the State's rights is a practical destruction of the power. I do not object to women voting if they get the right to vote exactly as men get their right to vote—by virtue of the State constitutions where they live. There is no reason why women should have the right to vote in any other way. The thoughtless advocate of suffrage does not appreciate that one method preserves the rights of the States and the other destroys it. They say that it makes but little difference how women get the right to vote, so they get it. A right obtained in the wrong way does more wrong than can be done in any other way. If women must have suffrage, let them have it by the acts of their neighbors and friends and fellow citizens of the States in which they live. If a State is not willing to give it to them, let them abide the hour until it is willing, for in no other way can local self-government exist. The destruction of the sovereignty of States is more fatal to liberty than the denial of votes to women. The concentration of all power at Washington must and will ultimately undermine our institutions. We have gone too far in that direction already.

The contention that it is difficult in some States to amend the constitution affords no reason for subverting their constitution by a Federal amendment which will coerce them into submission to a mere policy against what they think is their interests.

Again, the advocates of the Federal amendment say to you, "Why, the Constitution prohibits the denial of the right of suffrage to any person by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Are you not therefore willing to give to the white women of the country the same rights that the negro man has?" Of course this is a mere ad hominem argument, just like a good woman always uses. The negro man does not get affirmatively his right to vote by the fifteenth amendment. But that amendment is a restriction on the liberty of the State and its sovereign power in the selection of its electors. It should not have been passed. The fact that this wrong was done does not justify the perpetration of another wrong along the same line. Then, too, this amendment was passed at the close of a long and bloody war, when the real South had no voice in the Government. Many of the States of the South that were forced to vote for this amendment voted at a time when a majority of its best citizens were disfranchised and had no voice in the local government of the States. It is the only amendment to the Federal Constitution that was coerced. I have no objection to the colored man voting, but this privilege should have come from the States.

Again, with a good deal of complacency some of the advocates of the Federal amendment say that gentlemen who voted to submit for ratification to the States the prohibition amendment must upon the same ground vote to submit the suffrage amendment. The weakness of this suggestion ought to be apparent even to anyone, conditions being different. A man who voted to submit the prohibition amendment in obedience to the will of the majority of the people of the district or State he represented did right, because the highest principle involved in representative government is obedience to the will of the majority of the people as understood by their representative. The representative must comply with the will of the majority as he understands it, or, if he be an honorable man and can not do so, he must resign his commission. The people of the States whose representatives voted to submit the prohibition amendment did so in obedience to the overwhelming will of the people. Those who voted in the negative, if in obedience to the will of their constituents, also voted right.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. So it follows that whether a representative believes in a proposition or not personally he must in his representative capacity carry out the will of the people. If I believed that the majority of the people of my State or my district desire that I should vote to submit the suffrage amendment for ratification to the States I should do so, yielding to their will, regretting and condemning their judgment. This is the people's Government and they have a right to control it. In my opinion, the restrictions by the Federal Constitution are already too great upon the people of the States. We must seriously doubt the wisdom of any further extension of Federal power and authority. Already that power is overwhelming. The Constitution itself is pregnant with the seeds of imperialism. Its dormant and undeveloped powers, if exercised by an ambitious tyrant, are sufficient to make us an imperial Republic rather than a representative government. No man knows the extent to which power may be granted by the Congress to the Executive or how far judicial construction will extend existing powers of Government. It is not wise to further deprive the people of local self-government. I shall not discuss those extraordinary powers now being exercised pending the war in which we are engaged. The necessity of the situation has perhaps justified the extension of power that the Congress has granted to the Executive. Just a little more of Federalization of States' rights and and the power of the people over their local affairs forever ends.

When men deride the rights of States and of the people for local self-government and seek to bury them in an arbitrary policy to be fixed in the National Constitution, where only principles should find a place, they betray an absence of the knowledge of the principles on which a representative government rests. A monarchy with single power is just the same as a Republic of sovereign States for such people. They are honest, but see no difference. Some of the most intelligent men think that if any proposition can secure the vote of two-thirds of Congress for submission and three-fourths of the States should ratify it under the Constitution nothing more is desired. By this method the President might be given the power to name the officers of a State. This would be an infringement of State rights, but it would be proper in the minds of those who favor centralized power and think that amendments should be made to the Constitution to enforce a mere policy. While this may be an extreme case, it is no less to be considered than the slow processes that have been going on for years in taking away all power of the people locally in the States by centralizing that power at Washington. Power diffused among the people may prove at all times effective. No republic is as stable and powerful as a monarchy. But it is free. The power over vast territory like that of the United States, with millions of people, centralized at Washington, controlling the things that ought to be controlled alone by local power, will be an inevitable source of tyranny. I believe in the full exercise of Federal power under the Constitution, but oppose its extension unless absolutely necessary for the national defense and in the full exercise of the rights of the States. We must look beyond the mere language of an amendment to the conditions in the various sections of our country and the effect on the people in passing an amendment to the Constitution.

It has been insisted that the real purpose of this amendment is the basis for political legislation that will ultimately deprive the Southern States of representation in part in Congress and their force in national affairs. This may be and probably is true. It could occur if Congress should force all persons to vote under penalties. For Tennessee to grant suffrage to her women would be no material harm to the State, but to deprive her of the right by Federal amendment to do so or to force her to do so would be to deprive her of her sovereign power. Some of the Southern States are in a different attitude from Tennessee and Kentucky and other border States which have but a small colored population. In those Southern States where the colored population outnumbers the white to double the number of ignorant voters by giving the colored woman the right to vote would produce a condition that would be absolutely intolerable. We owe something to the wishes and the sentiments of the people of our sister States struggling to maintain law and order and white supremacy, and if suffrage can be given to the women State by State, as the States will it, and the errors and injustice as to some of the States could be avoided which a Federal amendment would produce, it would seem the part of wisdom to do so.

We are engaged now in a great foreign war. It is not the proper time to change the whole electoral system. It is not the time to consider amendments to the organic law. When the German Empire shall have been overthrown and peace given to the world, it will be time enough to urge this question as a part of the policy of our country. Patriotism, in my judgment, forbids the injection of this issue into national politics at this time. This is not the hour for any honest American or patriotic man to press this issue upon the people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I place in the RECORD a portion of the minority report and an editorial from the Baltimore Sun:

[From minority report.]

One of the very ablest of living Republicans, the Hon. Elihu Root, of New York, whose great learning and knowledge of the Constitution entitles any utterance of his to most careful consideration, has said:

"There is nothing more essentially and vitally local to a community than the way in which it shall select the officers who are to govern it. Any external power which can control that can control the local government. Nothing is more clear in the Constitution under which our Union was formed than that this is a matter of purely local concern."

Former President William H. Taft, in discussing this question, said:

"If in any of the States now acting on the question I were called upon to vote, I would vote against giving the suffrage, because I think to force it on an unwilling or indifferent majority is to add to the electorate an element that will not improve its governing capacity."

Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence and patron saint of Democracy, thus expressed his opinion of women mingling in political strife:

"All the world is now politically mad. Men, women, and children talk nothing else, and you know that naturally they talk much, loud, and long. Society is spoiled by it. But our good ladies, I trust, are too wise to wrinkle their foreheads with politics. * * * American women have the good sense to value domestic happiness above all other and to cultivate it beyond all other."

Former President Grover Cleveland, the first Democratic President after the Civil War, gave utterance to his conviction on this subject in the following language:

"I am willing to admit that it was only after a more thorough appreciation of what female suffrage really means that I became fully convinced that its inauguration would vastly increase the unhappy imperfections and shortcomings of our present man-voting suffrage. Its especial susceptibility to bad leadership and other hurtful influences would constitute it another menacing condition to those which already vex and disturb the deliberate and intelligent expression of the popular will."

Our present President, Woodrow Wilson, never exemplified his great qualities of statesmanship more clearly than when with reference to woman suffrage he said in the New York Times October 7, 1915:

"I believe that it should be settled by the States and not by the National Government."

Again, in a letter to Jane Jefferson Club, of Denver, Colo., October 7, 1916, he gave expression to this statement:

"Both the great political parties have in their recent platform favored the extension of suffrage to women through State action."

The President at various times has discussed the question of suffrage fully and at length, and always with the wisdom which he brings to the discussion of any question. In his textbook, State and Federal Governments of the United States, he announces the following indisputable truths:

"The suffrage in particular is a privilege which each State may grant upon terms of its own choosing, provided only that those terms be not inconsistent with a republican form of government.

"All the powers of the General Government are plainly such as affect interests which it would be impossible to regulate harmoniously by any scheme of separate State action, and only such; all other powers whatever remain with the States. With them rests the regulation of the suffrage.

"Federal law does not determine who shall vote for Members of the House of Representatives. The Constitution provides, simply, that all those persons in each State who are qualified under the constitution and laws of the State to vote for members of the larger of the two houses of the State legislature may vote also for Members of the House of Representatives of the United States. The franchise is regulated, therefore, entirely by State law."

In conclusion we desire to say that we stand with the views expressed by the President on this question of woman suffrage when, on December 23, 1914, he declared: "I still believe that it is a matter to be fought out in the individual States." This sentiment the President has since then on more than one occasion in effect reaffirmed.

Respectfully submitted.

[From the Baltimore Sun.]

SELLING THEIR BIRTHRIGHT FOR A MESS OF POTTAGE.

Southern Members of Congress and southern leadership in Congress have been the subjects of bitter criticism for months in many northern and New England newspapers which are in sympathy with President Wilson and which can generally be counted on to support the Democratic Party in presidential elections. While criticism of some southern leaders has been justified by their obstinate attitude with regard to conscription at the outset of the war and by the narrow and sectional spirit which they have manifested with regard to principles of war taxation, the Sun has been strongly inclined to resent the disposition to include all southern Members in this category and to regard a few as representative of the whole.

But in view of the reported change in the attitude of many southern Congressmen toward the suffrage amendment, and the motive unblushingly avowed for that change, we are compelled to believe that the South will have reason to join with the North and East in their scornful appraisement of the average Congressman from the Southern States. In Monday's Sun Representative JAMES C. CANTRILL, from the once proud State of Kentucky, was quoted as follows:

"The fact that the Congress is now almost evenly divided between the Democratic and Republican Parties," he says, "should force the Democratic Members from the South to give heed to the situation. This statement is based on the supposition that each Democrat is looking to the welfare of his party in the Nation and that he will not be governed by local conditions in his own district. The Democratic Party is now in control of all branches of the Federal Government. Almost every committee assignment, so far as the chairmanships are concerned, is held by southern Democrats, who thus far practically dictate the legislation of the Nation. We have this control, as everyone knows, because the woman-suffrage States in the last presidential election voted almost solidly for Democratic electors and candidates. For the Democratic Party in Congress to vote against the States that gave them this power would, in my opinion, be political suicide. For the southern Democrats in Congress to say to the millions of patriotic women of the Nation that suffrage shall not be given them would bring down upon our heads such condemnation from the suffrage States that we would be driven from power."

Mr. CANTRILL assumes that the women voters of the West decided the presidential election. Whether that be true or not—and it is open to dispute—Mr. CANTRILL deliberately proposes to his southern colleagues to trade the South's birthright of local self-government for a mess of political pottage. Committee chairmanships, in his view, it would seem, are more important than "local conditions" in the Southern States. And he thinks a Democratic majority in Congress is more essential than the protection of the South from negro domination. In a word, the new code proposed to southern Members is a code of political expediency and job-holding and not the old southern code of honor.

The proposition represents the practical abandonment of a policy which has been considered vital to prosperity and good government in the South. She is being betrayed in the house of her friends. As Judge HARRISON, of Virginia, points out, the adoption of this amendment will again force the people of the South "to face the hateful conditions which have prevailed in many parts" of that and other Southern States in the past. The conditions will, indeed, be more "hateful" and more menacing than before, because a new element will be added to the electorate, "deadlier than the male."

This southern desertion to suffrage is insincere and dishonest, and it will reap the reward of insincerity and dishonesty. The southern Members are hitching up to partners who have no respect for their race prejudices, no sympathy with southern feeling, and who will throw them overboard at the first opportunity. We trust the people of the South will put on their blacklist forever men who think committee chairmanships are things of greater value than the maintenance of white supremacy in their section. This is the plain issue that these strange southern representatives have raised.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair call it to my attention when I have used five minutes? Mr. Speaker, the man who does not know that to-day witnesses the dawn of a new era in the progress of civilization of mankind fails to comprehend what is passing in the world. Old things are passing away and we are coming into new and greater things. We are about to vitalize and make real the old theory that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. That theory has been the hope of mankind through the centuries. We are about to make that theory a glorious reality for the women of America. [Applause.] The new day that is now dawning will witness a leveling up of mankind throughout the world. It will witness the granting of all the powers of government by the governed throughout the world. Why, then, in our own glorious Republic should one-half of the intelligent people be denied by any State the right to participate in the Government they love and support? The resolution under consideration denies the right of any State to enact a law that will deny any citizen the right of voting because of sex. It is not an affirmative grant, as assumed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. It is the removal of an implied inhibition on the right of women to vote.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that women should not be granted the right of suffrage because they can not bear arms. The women of the world to-day have given to every battle front and to fighting ships on every sea the fighting men who are fighting the battles of this epoch-making war [applause], and the women of the world are the inspiration to those men on every battle front. And more, they are doing as much for the success of this war in America and throughout the allied countries as are the men behind the lines. They are doing every kind of work to-day that men are doing behind the lines—manufacturing arms, munition, clothing, and so forth—doing every manner of work. At this very moment in these galleries the women who are listening to this discussion are working for the soldiers. Not a man to-day in these galleries is doing anything except idly listening to what is going on. The women are doing something for the comfort of the soldiers on the battle fields and in the trenches and on the fighting ships. [Applause.] The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] said that this resolution should not be agreed to or considered at a time when the Nation is engaged in an awful war. There never was a more propitious time for this Nation, that entered this war to secure for those who are governed the right to have a voice in the Governments under which they live than at this hour for America to grant the right of suffrage to the noble women of the Republic. If it is right for America to participate in this war in behalf of the consent of the governed in other lands, it can not be denied that Congress should go as far as it can go to grant the right of suffrage to all the women of the United States. I am for the resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the question before this House is adoption of a rule. I object to the adoption of the rule with such extreme haste. The gentleman who has just preceded me has many times spoken in this House, and spoken very strongly, against bringing in a rule and adopting it with a provision for only 40 minutes for debate, 20 minutes for each side. Here is an important matter which is brought up for consideration. The question of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is, to my mind, a very much different proposition than the presenting for consideration and enactment into law of a measure which might be a proposition of only minor importance. But in my opinion a constitutional amendment, which vitally affects the entire country, should have more mature consideration. I shall not argue as to the privilege of any man in this House or any man in the country or any woman in the country to have the right to their own views on the question of the adoption of this amendment, which the arbitrary action of the Committee on Rules forces us to discuss and consider. I do say for myself I believe it is literally wrong for Members to stand here and talk about the adoption of a rule and then begin to use as an argument for the proposition that we follow the rule if adopted, and then propose to limit the debate in which 435 Members of this House ought to have the privilege of participation when less than 300 minutes are granted for debate.

We are here to consider the question of the advisability of the adoption of this rule with such a limited debate. Now, I have been a Member of this House for nearly 20 years and I have seen rules brought in here from time to time with very limited time allowed for debate on the question of the rule. I have seen gentlemen on the other side of the House, when the Republicans were in the majority, pound us as hard as they could, because we brought in a rule providing for a limited debate on a simple proposition, and they solemnly and vigorously protested that when the Democracy came into power there would be no such arbitrary rules presented. But if you will examine the RECORD I think you will find that very many more drastic rules have been brought into this body during the limited time the Democracy has been in power than was ever done by the Republican Party when we were in power during the long term of our service.

I oppose this rule because I believe it is wrong to take up a constitutional question and to act on it with such limited debate. Even when the rule is adopted, we shall have so little time for debate that the question can hardly be brought to a decent consideration. Now, I have rarely voted for a rule in this House. I do not believe in bringing matters up in that way. I do not believe that this rule is necessary. We have a very limited calendar, and there would have been ample opportunity to bring up this proposition, and have it properly considered, before the time when the congressional session will be brought to a close, because we are going to be in session for a great many months, and there is no reason in the world for this House to bring up and force its immediate consideration such a drastic rule. I am opposed to the rule on that ground. When it comes to the question of the adoption or the passage of the resolution, if I can get a little time, I shall talk briefly on that proposition; but I am speaking now on the question of this drastic rule, brought in by unanimous vote of the committee, and putting such a limited debate on an amendment to the Constitution.

I am not a lawyer, but I am one who has read the Constitution a great many times. A very few Members of this House, I fear, have read it, but I have read it many times, and there have been just 17 amendments adopted since the original Constitution was framed by the master minds whom God had inspired in the cabin of the Mayflower to formulate the Constitution of the Plymouth Colony which was made the basis of the Constitution of Massachusetts and subsequently resulted in the establishment of the Constitution of the United States under which we now live. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments were passed by this body and were concurred in by the Senate. That is, the men from the South could not obtain representation in this House and return to the home of their fathers unless they voted for the acceptance of these amendments which were intended for the protection of the slave whose freedom was provided as the result of the Civil War. They voted for these amendments because they wanted figuratively to get back to the fleshpots of Egypt. They did not want to stay out in the cold any longer. They had been whipped in the war and wanted to get back, and they were willing to adopt any amendment in order to get back home once more. But it is to their everlasting discredit that they have ignored these amendments ever since. They are here now with the privileges their successors now enjoy.

I still strongly desire to state that I think the rule is wrong and ought not to be adopted, and I shall vote against it because I do not believe in it and I wish to reserve my individual rights.

I append a brief reference to some reasons why I shall vote against this amendment. There are many other reasons which might also be referred to, but I deem these I have presented sufficient to justify my actions.

Since the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress opened I have met several women suffragists from the State of Massachusetts. I have immediately propounded to them this one question: "Do you approve or disapprove of the suffrage banners in front of the White House with the following words emblazoned thereon, namely, 'Kaiser Wilson, what will you do for woman suffrage?'" The banners with these words inscribed thereon were flaunted many days during the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. The day the Russian visitors called on President Wilson they were especially offensive. The answer in nearly every case to my inquiry was, "I glory in that demonstration." President Wilson, while not my choice for President, is the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, and this action in time of war was insulting to him and to the Nation in the terrible struggle in which we are now engaged and were then endeavoring to make successful. Besides, the response to my question was very offensive, and I immediately ordered these suffrage advocates from my office.

I have watched the suffrage movement at close range. I am very much opposed to the efforts made at the Capitol and elsewhere in the propaganda having for its purpose the adoption of the suffrage amendment. Large sums of money have been contributed, and have been and are to be expended, to bring about the adoption of said amendment. This method is objectionable and is corrupting in its nature. Threats have been uttered to me by suffragists that they would be present in my district and oppose my reelection next year. I am not disturbed by this threat. But I respectfully beg leave to state that I can not perform my duty as a Member of the House of Representatives in accordance with my oath of office by supporting this amendment, and I shall record my vote against it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] use some of his time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have only two minutes remaining. There will be only one other speech.

Mr. FOSTER. I have three minutes remaining, and will grant it to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, when the resolution similar to this was before the House three years ago I opposed it. I opposed it upon two grounds. I opposed it as a matter of principle, on the ground that Congress ought not to submit constitutional amendments unless it was reasonably probable that, if submitted, the amendments would be adopted in the near future. Three years have gone by and that condition is changed. That argument no longer applies, and I think that nearly everyone will agree that if this amendment be adopted during this session of Congress it will be ratified by a sufficient number of the States within less than five years. [Applause.]

Another ground that I then took was that if submitted by the States the people directly vote upon the question, whereas if submitted by the Federal Government the legislatures themselves act upon it. But it was a matter of some humiliation to me, within a very few weeks after the House considered that resolution, to find that my own State legislature had refused to permit the people of my State to vote upon the question of woman suffrage. And so I have been compelled to change my mind upon that question. Therefore I am heartily supporting this amendment to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there should be no partisanship in the consideration of this resolution; and yet I must congratulate the Republican side of the House that because of the fact that an overwhelming majority of them will vote for this resolution to-day they have compelled the President of the United States to change his mind upon this proposition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield.

Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful from that fact that as time goes on the President may in some other matters be susceptible to Republican influence occasionally. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, there should be no sectionalism in the consideration of this resolution to-day, and yet we might as well squarely face the fact that if this resolution does not this afternoon secure the necessary two-thirds vote it will be due to one section of this country and to Democratic votes—the solid South. From a Republican standpoint, from a partisan standpoint, it would be an advantage to Republicans to be able to go before the people in the next election and say that this resolution was defeated by southern Democrats. But, Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will not give us Republicans that opportunity. I hope there will not be a solid South upon this proposition.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I shall have to decline to yield.

You gentlemen of the South, how often you have stood on this floor and decried sectionalism! I have agreed with you. Let us not have sectionalism upon this proposition to-day. No other section of the country stands as you have stood upon this proposition, and, as I said a few moments ago, if this resolution is defeated to-day the country will understand whom to hold responsible—one section of the country, controlling a portion of the Democratic Party.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, there will be only one other speech. Has the gentleman from Kansas exhausted all his time?

The SPEAKER. Except one minute. Does he desire to use that?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield it back to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

The SPEAKER. That gives the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] four minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who has just taken his seat, and who refused to yield, gives as a reason for voting for this joint resolution that the legislature of his own State refused to permit the people to vote on the question of woman suffrage. Here is the logic of his argument, namely, that because the legislature of his own State refused to allow the women to vote he is going to vote for a joint resolution that deprives the people of every State of this Union of the privilege of voting upon it. [Applause.] That is the logic of his argument. He made a good speech against this proposition three years ago. [Laughter.] Now he has changed his mind.

Mr. LENROOT. Others have.

Mr. GORDON. Gentlemen, this proposition involves treason to the principle of representative government, and is a gross violation of the national platform of the Republican and Democratic Parties adopted in the last campaign. [Applause.] Mr. Hughes bolted the platform before election, and he got his for it. [Laughter.] He lost the State of Ohio because he repudiated his party platform on the question of the right of the States to control the granting of suffrage.

Mr. MADDEN. What will happen to Mr. Wilson? [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Wilson is not running for office now.

A MEMBER. He has kept us out of war. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORDON. Any man in this House, whether Democrat or Republican, who votes for this resolution, and who did not in the campaign in 1916 publicly repudiate that plank in his platform, is guilty of bad faith with his constituents, every single one. The Republican platform declared that the question of suffrage is one that should be determined by the people of the States. Now, because in some of the most important States the people themselves have voted down this proposition, you propose to force it upon them by a constitutional amendment through Congress and the legislatures of other States. I say this is an outrage, and every decent man—Democrat or Republican—who votes for this resolution ought to blush for his vote. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] is mistaken when he says that those who favor equal suffrage by their votes to-day will blush for their action. By a large majority this afternoon this House will go on record as favoring a fundamental principle of government by the people, and those who blush for their attitude will be those who vote against it. [Applause.]

The gentleman seemingly does not recognize the fact that we are living in a new world and that old conditions will not return again.

> New conditions teach new duties;
> Time makes ancient good uncouth;
> They must upward still and onward
> Who would keep abreast of truth.
> Lo! before us gleam her campfires;
> We ourselves must pilgrims be;
> Launch our Mayflower and steer boldly
> O'er the wild, tempestuous sea,
> Nor attempt the future's portals
> With the past's blood-rusted key.

America is in a new epoch since last April, and we must meet conditions as they exist to-day. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] states that this is not the time for action on this great question. His argument is reiterated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. Gentlemen of the House, this is the time above all others. If America does not act now she will be a laggard instead of a leader in this great movement for the democracy for which liberty-loving nations are battling around the world.

Even in the midst of the welter of war the allied nations, the neutrals, and even the central powers are pledging equal suffrage to their peoples. At this very moment the question is pending in the British Parliament, in the Chamber of Deputies of France, and the legislative body of Italy. The heroic King of Belgium has promised that one of the first acts after his Kingdom is restored will be to see that women are enfranchised as a reward for the valiant service they have rendered in time of disaster.

These nations, even in the shadow of the Prussian mailed fist, have thought this great task of liberation worthy of consideration and action. Surely America can not rightfully take the position that this question should be delayed indefinitely.

Even in the German Reichstag, in Bohemia, and in Hungary the right of equal suffrage has been discussed, and in some instances that right has been pledged. Surely America will not allow the exponents of autocracy to lead the way in this advance of democracy. Now is the appointed time for action. Let the oldest and greatest democracy in the world lead this movement instead of straggling in the rear.

But, Mr. Speaker, Congress should also adopt this amendment now because there is a Nation-wide compelling demand from the people that this fundamental question be submitted to them for settlement. The Rules Committee, the Judiciary Committee, and the Woman Suffrage Committee have all held hearings at which were represented millions of American citizens, all asking action on this amendment. From every town and hamlet and city have come petitions urging that at least Congress give the people the right to act upon equal suffrage. Already more than one-fourth of the membership of this House and of the Senate come from States where women vote.

There have been 29 State elections held where this question was an issue. In these elections the total vote of men voting in favor of granting the franchise to women was 4,703,371. These were elections at which only male voters cast their ballots. While the number is increased by the fact that a second election was held in two States, still it is a conservative estimate, counting the women voters and those who favor it in States where no election has been held, that there are to-day at least 7,000,000 American voters who would go to the polls and vote that this amendment should be submitted to the States for decision. Whenever there is such a demand as that this House has no right to refuse to submit any question to the people. Putting aside the merits of the question itself and how individual Members feel about equal suffrage, the fact remains that it is the duty of Congress to refer this question or any question to the States when demanded by such a large proportion of the American electorate and citizenship.

Mr. Speaker, there must also be considered the fact that this amendment is essential to the equality of rights upon which this Government stands. Women to-day in many States help to elect a President and to choose a national administration. Women in other States are absolutely disfranchised, a situation which is manifestly unjust and unfair.

But still worse, the women voters in equal-suffrage States have no protection at all when they change their residence into other States. An amendment to the National Constitution, the recognition that America is a Nation and not a collection of States, is essential if there is to be "Equal rights to all, special privileges to none."

Congress should pass this amendment now, because this Nation needs as never before the votes of its women. It will add to the molding force that element of citizenship which naturally looks to the common welfare in time of peace. The evils in society are regarded as hostile forces by women, for they see their effects upon the home. The problems of bad housing, unwholesome food, conservation of life and health, commercialized vice, evil working conditions, all need the remedial hand of the home maker.

But if that is true in time of peace, it is doubly true in time of war. America needs the help of its womanhood as never before. The problems of this armed conflict include the problems of food, clothing, nursing, thrift, conservation, and others which are much more in woman's line than in man's. Every call sent out by the Nation to the women has been answered with enthusiastic devotion. Their work has been one of the splendid things of the past year, but I maintain that all these efforts would be vastly more effective if with them went the power to express patriotism, devotion, and convictions in the place where they count most after all—in the voting booth on the day of election.

Let us release the energy which has been expended by necessity in the effort to secure an undoubted right and turn it into the channels of activities which will make surer the conquest of democracy over autocracy. When we remember that more girls are graduated every year from high schools and colleges than boys; when we remember that only one-fortieth of the inmates of our jails and penitentiaries are women, we must see that this step of liberation will mean an addition to the educated, moral, law-abiding electorate which is needed now and in the trying days which lie ahead.

Mr. Speaker, one of the guiding maxims of Napoleon was "A clear pathway for merit." He told his army that every soldier carried in his knapsack the baton of a marshal of France. Because this idea was the exact opposite of the Bourbon idea and because Napoleon's career itself showed that his poverty, low birth, and other handicaps did not act as a bar against ability and genius, the people of France followed the Little Corporal as the very personification of the spirit of their new nation.

America to-day must have a clear pathway for merit. At a dreadful cost in blood and treasure she wrote into the fabric of this Nation that neither color nor race nor previous condition of servitude should bar entrance to that pathway.

To-day, by orderly, peaceable methods outlined in the organic law of the land, we have the opportunity to say that the pathway for merit shall not be barred on account of sex.

That is the issue, for it is a fraudulent affront to argue that the vote will not be used wisely by women. Every observer of actual conditions has testified that the effect of women on political conditions has been elevating. But even if that were not assured, still suffrage is fairly due the women of America, and the debt should be paid. No honest man who owes another $10 refuses to pay his debt because he feels that perhaps the money will not be wisely spent. The ballot is a debt owed the womanhood of America, and now is the time to pay the debt.

Mr. Speaker, the people demand the submission of this amendment to them. The nations of the world are preparing to enfranchise their own women, and America must not prove recreant. The Nation needs the votes of its women in peace and in war. This amendment is the only way to secure a national solution for a national question. I sincerely hope and believe that this amendment will be adopted by a two-thirds majority, and that this Congress will nobly measure up to its responsibility and its opportunity. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, one moment. Those of us who are opposed to the resolution have not interposed any sort of delay by way of votes or demands for roll calls, by which we have saved a good deal of time. I ask unanimous consent of all of the Members of the House that the time that would otherwise be taken in roll calls be added to the general debate. It would be about an hour. I ask unanimous consent to amend the report of the Committee on Rules by inserting "five" where "four" occurs, the effect of which will be to give five hours of debate in this body instead of four hours. I think that is a reasonable request, because, as I said, we have not interposed a moment's delay.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that, in consideration of not calling for the yeas and nays, the time it would take be added to the general debate.

Mr. FOSTER. With the understanding that we conclude this matter to-day?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, yes; certainly, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman from Virginia if he would not be willing to fix the time, which may be a little later than 5 o'clock?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. So far as I am concerned, I am agreed.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say to the gentleman from Virginia that if we can fix it at 5 o'clock, I have no objection. I ask to amend by fixing it not later than 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That is the time that the rule fixes.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that; but it also provides that not exceeding four hours of general debate shall be had, and in any event it shall not go beyond 5 o'clock. I ask that general debate shall not run later than 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the rule shall be so amended that debate shall close at 5 o'clock. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the passage of the rule as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

"Article —.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article."

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask those in the management of this debate if the Chair understands the situation correctly. The Chair's understanding is that the four following Members shall each control one-quarter of the time: The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER]. Is that correct?

Mr. RAKER. That is the understanding, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And amendments will be in order after debate is closed?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That gives to each one of the four Members an hour and a quarter.

The SPEAKER. It gives to each one one-quarter of the time, whatever there is. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding I ask unanimous consent that all Members who speak on the resolution be given the privilege of revising and extending their remarks.

Mr. NORTON. That is included in the rule.

The SPEAKER. No; there is no such provision in the rule.

Mr. NORTON. It is in the rule that I have in my hand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the wrong rule. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen have five legislative days in which to print remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, that was not the request of the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. I intended to make that request after I got consent to my first request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all Members speaking on the resolution may have leave to revise and extend their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to have that qualified so that those who do extend their remarks will not have leave to incorporate telegrams or letters, but that it shall be their own speech.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman objecting?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am, without that qualification.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California adopt that qualification?

Mr. RAKER. I do, under the circumstances.

Mr. McARTHUR. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman how many days we will have?

The SPEAKER. From now until the close of the session, under a general leave of that sort.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is that broad enough to include those who have already spoken?

Mr. RAKER. I intend that it shall.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend remarks upon this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend remarks on the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. Reserving the right to object, I think the same stipulation should be made that there shall not be telegrams and letters included.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California accept the qualification?

Mr. RAKER. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, personally I had intended to object, because I think it is a bad practice to make the RECORD show what does not happen; but there have been so many individual requests for time that I do not desire to punish anybody, and therefore I shall not object.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to inquire if it would interfere with the gentleman's plan in any way if he permitted the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] to open the debate on this resolution?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time, and will permit the lady from Montana to open the debate under the circumstances. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, we are facing to-day a question of political evolution. International circumstances have forced this question to an issue. Our country is in a state of war. The Nation has had a terrible shock. The result has been a sudden change in our national consciousness. The things we have for years been taking for granted are suddenly assuming a new significance for us.

We as a Nation were born in a land of unparalleled resources, of vast acreage of fertile soil, of minerals, of coal, oil, gas, of timber, and water power. The combinations in which these resources were found, together with our great natural highways, gave us opportunities for development which no other nation could boast. And we had people, people in whose veins ran the blood of all nations, people imbued with the buoyancy of youth, fearless, and with the will and energy to make their dreams of freedom come true.

Without restraint we drew upon the stored treasure of the past. We spent recklessly, and we wasted our natural resources and our human energy with youthful abandon.

And then came the world war, and with its coming our carefree attitude was suddenly replaced by a new seriousness. To-day we are mobilizing all our resources for the ideals of democracy. We are taking stock of our available energy. And we are finding that with all our past wastefulness we still have limitless resources upon which we can count. We have men—men for the Army, for the Navy, for the air; men for the industries, the mines, the fields; men for the Government. And the national leaders are now reaching out and drawing men of talent, picking those with the best minds, with expert knowledge, and with broad perspective to aid in war work.

But something is still lacking in the completeness of our national effort. With all our abundance of coal, with our great stretches of idle, fertile land, babies are dying from cold and hunger; soldiers have died for lack of a woolen shirt.

Might it not be that the men who have spent their lives thinking in terms of commercial profit find it hard to adjust themselves to thinking in terms of human needs? Might it not be that a great force that has always been thinking in terms of human needs, and that always will think in terms of human needs, has not been mobilized? Is it not possible that the women of the country have something of value to give the Nation at this time?

It would be strange indeed if the women of this country through all these years had not developed an intelligence, a feeling, a spiritual force peculiar to themselves, which they hold in readiness to give to the world. It would be strange if the influence of women through direct participation in the political struggles, through which all social and industrial development proceeds, would not lend a certain virility, a certain influx of new strength and understanding and sympathy and ability to the exhausting effort we are now making to meet the problem before us.

For 70 years the women leaders of this country have been asking the Government to recognize this possibility. Every great woman who stands out in our history—Susan B. Anthony, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Clara Barton, Mary Livermore, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Frances Willard, Lucy Stone, Jane Addams, Ella Flagg Young, Alice Stone Blackwell, Anna Howard Shaw, Mrs. Catt—all have asked the Government to permit women to serve more effectively the national welfare. All have felt that the energy, the thought, and the suffering that was spent in trying to obtain permission to serve directly should as quickly as possible be turned to the actual service. And in the meantime they did all they could indirectly. They learned to read and to know each other. They became interested in each others' problems, for they found them to be their own problems. As they were the stabilizing influence in the home and kept the family unity, so they have become a great possible stabilizing influence in society, asking now to help keep the unity of the Nation to its highest standard of service.

They have stood back of the men. They have pioneered with them, rejoiced with them over their successes, and, when they failed, encouraged them and helped them to begin again. The women have done all that they were allowed to do, all that the men planned for them to do. But through all their work they have pleaded for the political machinery which would enable them to do more.

To-day as never before the Nation needs its women—needs the work of their hands and their hearts and their minds. Their energy must be utilized in the most effective service they can give. Are we now going to refuse these women the opportunity to serve in the face of their plea—in the face of the Nation's great need? Are you gentlemen representing the South, you who have struggled with your negro problem for half a century, going to retaliate after 50 years for the injustice you believe was done you so long ago? Have you not learned in your struggle for adjustment in the South to be broad and fair and open-minded in dealing with another franchise problem that concerns the whole Nation?

The women of the South have stood by you through every trial. They have backed you in every struggle, and they gave themselves and all they held most dear for the cause for which their men laid down their lives. Now they are asking to help you again in a big, broad, national way. Are you going to deny them the equipment with which to help you effectively simply because the enfranchisement of a child-race 50 years ago brought you a problem you were powerless to handle?

There are more white women of voting age in the South to-day than there are negro men and women together. Are you going to say to these thoughtful women: "After 50 years we have been unable to accomplish more than a temporary adjustment of our problem; and now we refuse to let you disturb us, even to help us"? Dare you say that in the face of our tremendous national crisis—in the face of problems too great to rest upon the old doctrines of our youth, but demanding the action of a Nation united in spirit and using all its power?

These are heroic times, and they call for the strength and the courage and the dignity to think and act in national terms. We thought in national terms when we restricted activities by the prohibition amendment a few weeks ago. Why can we not now think in national terms and extend opportunities?

Our President emphasized the great nationalizing process our country is undergoing when he took over the railroads of the country to meet this crisis. The food and fuel problems must soon be solved by nationalization. We are working and thinking to-day not as separate States but as a Nation. We must discuss public affairs not as Montanans or New Yorkers or Floridians but as Americans, taking always a national perspective and looking toward the welfare of the entire country.

We have made the protection of our child workers a national question. We declared war not State by State but by Federal action. We mobilized and equipped our Army not State by State but through Congress. Shall our women, our home defense, be our only fighters in the struggle for democracy who shall be denied Federal action? It is time for our old political doctrines to give way to the new visions, the new aspects of national and international relations which have come to us already since the war began.

For we have had new visions; we have been aroused to a new way of looking at things. Our President, with his wisdom and astuteness, has helped us to penetrate new problems, to analyze situations, to make fine distinctions. He startled us by urging us to distinguish between the German Government and the German people. We who have been steeped in democratic ideals since the days when our forefathers signed the Declaration of Independence find it difficult to think of government as something separate from the people.

Yet, as we learn to make this distinction for Germany, will not our minds revert to our own situation and be puzzled? How can people in other countries who are trying to grasp our plan of democracy avoid stumbling over our logic when we deny the first steps in democracy to our women? May they not see a distinction between the Government of the United States and the women of the United States?

Deep down in the hearts of the American people is a living faith in democracy. Sometimes it is not expressed in the most effective way. Sometimes it seems almost forgotten. But when the test comes we find it still there, groping and aspiring, and helping men and women to understand each other and their common need. It is our national religion, and it prompts in us the desire for that measure of justice which is based on equal opportunity, equal protection, equal freedom for all. In our hearts we know that this desire can be realized only when "those who submit to authority have a voice in their own government," whether that government be political, industrial, or social.

To-day there are men and women in every field of endeavor who are bending all their energies toward a realization of this dream of universal justice. They believe that we are waging a war for democracy. The farmer who knows the elements of democracy becomes something of an idealist when he contemplates the possibility of feeding the world during this crisis. The woman who knits all day to keep from thinking of the sacrifice she is making wonders what this democracy is which she is denied and for which she is asked to give. The miner is dreaming his dreams of industrial democracy as he goes about 2,000 feet underground, bringing forth from the rock precious metals to help in the prosecution of this war.

The girl who works in the Treasury no longer works until she is married. She knows now that she will work on and on and on. The war has taken from her opportunities for the joys that young girls look forward to. Cheerfully and willingly she makes her sacrifice. And she will pay to the very end in order that the future need not find women paying again for the same cause.

The boys at the front know something of the democracy for which they are fighting. These courageous lads who are paying with their lives testified to the sincerity of their fight when they sent home their ballots in the New York election, and voted two to one in favor of woman suffrage and democracy at home. [Applause.]

These are the people of the Nation. These are the fiber and sinew of war—the mother, the farmer, the miner, the industrial worker, the soldier. These are the people who are giving their all for the cause of democracy. These are the people who are resting their faith in the Congress of the United States because they believe that Congress knows what democracy means. These people will not fight in vain.

Can we afford to allow these men and women to doubt for a single instant the sincerity of our protestations of democracy? How shall we answer their challenge, gentlemen; how shall we explain to them the meaning of democracy if the same Congress that voted for war to make the world safe for democracy refuses to give this small measure of democracy to the women of our country? [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully request the Members of the House that I be permitted to proceed without interruption, and I will beg the Chair to advise me when I have consumed 10 minutes. This proposed amendment should be passed "as an act of right and justice" to the women of America.

To my mind, this is one of the most important questions that has been presented to the Congress since I have been a Member, one that has far more wide-reaching effect upon the people of the country, in so far as what the country stands for and what we stand for, than any other question since the writing of the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of our Constitution. There are 20,000,000 of American women in this country who are of age and entitled to vote, and they simply ask that you extend to them the same right that has been extended to the men of the country. The present amendment does not seek to make any change in that respect; it does not make the change that the opponents claim it does. It does not fix the qualifications. The fact is that her sex, for which she is not responsible, has been the basis for a denial to women of the privilege of participating in this Government. The same qualifications that exist in the States for men, giving them the right to vote, will apply to women. At present when she goes to register or to the polls to vote she is denied that right because she is a female and not a male. There is not one of the qualifications provided in the several States that she can not meet. There is no qualification provided for in any of the State constitutions or their laws that every American citizen can not meet. He must be 21 years of age and a resident of the State, and so forth, and only a few States fix limitations on account of property, and we are truly sorry for that. We provide that those under 21 years of age, because of their want of knowledge of the condition of affairs, shall not vote; that the insane and idiots and those convicted of crime shall not vote. Suffrage is extended to every man in the United States except under the conditions named, and the woman simply asks now that she be given the same right as the man.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not at present, if the gentleman will pardon me. This is unquestionably a war measure——

Mr. MADDEN. I was trying to get some explanation about some matters in the report that I do not quite understand.

Mr. RAKER. I will yield for a question then.

Mr. MADDEN. I notice on the first page of the report written by the gentleman the names of a number of gentlemen and of the lady who have introduced resolutions with respect to suffrage, and on the second page I notice the gentleman from California says that Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado has been a true and loyal advocate of this measure and is one of the pioneers in this work, but he does not say anything about what the others have done. What has that to do with this question?

Mr. RAKER. Nothing, only I like to give credit to whom credit is due.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought maybe they were all entitled to equal credit.

Mr. RAKER. I try to give them all credit.

This is a war measure, unquestionably. The American women of this country are doing the same as the men. In the factory, in the field, in the shop, in fact, in every field of endeavor where aid and assistance could be given to the Government in its mighty struggle for democracy this has been demonstrated. In foreign countries the women are necessary to wage the war, so that the supply of munitions and other things to carry it on may be kept up. In justice to the women of America we say that they should be given the right to vote in this country and thereby become actual and living factors in its affairs and activities.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield for more than a moment. I yield to my colleague on the committee for a question.

Mr. MEEKER. Does the gentleman realize that a very large majority of the women who are doing actual war work do not want this vote?

Mr. RAKER. No; it is just the contrary. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. It is not the contrary.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in Canada, where many hundreds of thousands of their men have gone to the front, the Canadian Government realized the need of the support of its patriotic women. Five Provinces of Canada have granted provincial suffrage. The Canadian Parliament realized and recognized that these women must have the power of the vote, and in September of this year granted the Federal franchise to women, which gave the vote to a million and a half of them, and those loyal Canadian women, with the loyal Canadian men, joined in support of the Canadian Union Government. When the question of conscription was up and to carry on the war, the women by their vote helped to win it. It has been recognized by the premier and the other leading men of Canada that if it had not been for the loyal women's vote in Canada the result might have been disastrous or serious to Canada. In the same way in England, where they have been in this struggle for three years, Parliament has seen fit and proper to give enough time to this question to consider it, and it has passed the House of Commons by vote of 7 to 1, and has gone to the House of Lords, where within the next two weeks they expect to pass it, and it will then receive the King's signature. The women of Australia have stood loyally and patriotically by their Government in this war. They have voted for conscription, they have voted for war, because this is a war for democracy, in which the women are as much interested as the men. And while our men at the front are unable to participate, they have by their vote in the New York election demonstrated how they feel upon this question. When the soldier vote came back it was 2 to 1 for woman suffrage, because they know that mother, wife, and sister at the polls will do everything in their power to uphold the hands of their Government in the way of lives, money, and until, if need be, the last sacrifice has been made, although we hope it will not be needed, to win this war for democracy.

I want to recall to my Republican friends this fact, and I want to say to you, my Republican friends, that your action on this matter is ideal, although it followed hours, and even days, after the declaration of the President. You deserve credit for the position you have taken.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. DENISON. It was known by the committee that went to see the President that the Republicans were going to take this matter up and pass it in caucus, was it not?

Mr. RAKER. I want to say to my Republican friends upon this question that I have been in conference with the President for over three years upon this question, and that over three weeks ago I went to him for his advice and to ask him how the matter stood. He told me the same then as he told the committee yesterday afternoon; and I leave it to the members of that committee if this was not his own language. He said: "Raker knew, but he knew how to keep his advice and counsel until the proper time." [Applause.]

Now, to my Democratic friends I want to say this: The Speaker of this House, the chairmen of the committees of this House, and the officers who constitute the organization of this House hold their positions to-day as the result of the votes of women. Without the votes of the Democratic Members from California, the Speaker would not be in the Chair. These Democratic Members from California would not have been elected without the votes of the women of California. Every man who holds a chairmanship of a committee owes it to the woman vote of the West. And I want to say further to the Members on the Democratic side that the returns indicated two hours before we closed our polls in the West that the President was defeated——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Just a moment. But when the final vote was taken the women, realizing what had been done and where the President stood, voted to the last minute for President Wilson. They realized that the Democratic Party had stood for certain things; that they had revised the rules of the House, provided for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, established the postal-savings bank act, Philippine independence, the Porto Rican bill, the child-labor bill, the antitrust law, revision of the tariff downward, the anti-injunction bill, labor legislation, eight-hour law for railroad employees, Alaska railroad, Alaska coal-leasing law, public-land legislation, irrigation-extension act, Federal farm-loan law, Mine Bureau legislation, Department of Labor, and many other progressive and liberal laws demanded by the people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to notify the gentleman that he has used 10 minutes.

Mr. KEARNS. How did the women of California find out and learn where the President stood on this thing just before election last fall? Nobody else seemed to know it.

Mr. RAKER. They knew it.

Mr. KEARNS. How did they find it out?

Mr. RAKER. I will take a minute or two——

Mr. KEARNS. I wish the gentleman would.

Mr. RAKER. The President went home and registered. The President went home and voted for woman suffrage.

Mr. KEARNS. He said he believed in it for the several States——

Mr. RAKER. One moment—and the people of California and the women of the West realized that a man who performs and does acts is better than a man who promises and never does. [Applause.] Therefore they voted for the man whom they believed would carry out the principles for which they stood.

Mr. KEARNS. That is the only information they had upon the subject, is it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it not a fact they voted for him because he kept us out of war? Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just for a question.

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield. Again I want to appeal to my Democratic friends. Lying on this table here are hundreds of telegrams from the loyal women of the South. From every organization and association these women are appealing to Congress that they be recognized as are the men of this country in regard to the right to vote. They say that the negro question is a camouflage, and that they can well take care of it. There are over 8,788,000 white women in the South and 4,000,000 colored. You will have over 4,000,000 more white women than you will have colored. The total negro population is 8,294,274, and white women outnumber both negro males and females by nearly half a million. Therefore, from every conceivable point this resolution should pass. Here are telegrams open for your inspection which show that tens of thousands of loyal women of the South in every Southern State are writing, demanding, and pleading that they be given the right to participate in the affairs of their Government.

Woman suffrage is no longer a controversial question; it is an established fact in nearly half the territory of our country. Wyoming in 1869 led the way and New York in 1917 carried the question "over the top." No one denies that the coming of woman suffrage over the entire country is inevitable. The experiments already tried over a succession of many years have proved certain incontrovertible facts. (1) When the opportunity offers women vote in about the same proportion to their numbers as men. (2) Their vote has wrought no mysterious unfeminizing influence upon them, as the world once feared, nor caused neglect of children, home, or husbands. (3) It has not overturned political parties, nor the social order, nor in any way proved an abnormal or discordant influence. (4) On the contrary, by strengthening the demand for good laws governing home conditions and care of children mothers have been enabled to do their work in the world to better effect. Their influence upon politics and society in general has been a positive and not a negative force. The opinions of the men and women of the suffrage States are practically unanimous on these points.

With the overwhelming testimony on the one hand that woman suffrage in practice is a success and the unanswerable argument for the justice of woman suffrage on the other, there is nothing for a fair-minded American to do but to recognize the fact that woman suffrage is a sound principle in theory and in practice.

With woman suffrage established as a sound principle, the only question remaining is, How shall it be written into the law of the land?

All political parties are pledged to woman suffrage by the planks of their 1916 platforms. Some construe the planks of the Democratic and Republican Parties to mean suffrage for women by amendment of State constitutions only; but the planks of neither party stipulate that there shall be no Federal action. While they declare for suffrage by State action, they do not declare against suffrage by Federal action.

Since the adoption of those platforms circumstances and opinions have radically changed under the quickened impulse toward democracy brought about largely by the war. The reversal of opinion in New York is indicative of the change of view of the whole country.

To carry into effect this change of opinion by State action is clearly impossible at this time. The process is slow and the provisions of many State constitutions practically prohibit amendment. To cling to that plan of procedure longer is, therefore, to repudiate real democracy in the Nation for a method not applicable to present conditions nor responsive to the present demand.

Meanwhile woman suffrage has made amazing progress in foreign lands. In every belligerent country the services of the women in the munition factories, the railways, the shipyards, the offices of administration, have first amazed men and then filled them with admiration and gratitude. The expressions have been numerous among the chiefs of the war departments in Great Britain and France that the successes so far attained would have been impossible without the aid of women. The most conspicuous change of front is that of Mr. Asquith, long premier of Great Britain and an implacable enemy of woman suffrage. Said he:

> Short of actually bearing arms in the field, there is hardly a service which has contributed or is contributing to the maintenance of our cause in which women have not been at least as active and as efficient as men, and wherever we turn we see them doing, with zeal and success and without any detriment to the prerogatives of their sex, work which three years ago would have been regarded as falling exclusively within the province of men. This is not a merely sentimental argument, though it appeals to our feelings as well as our judgment. But what I confess moves me still more in this matter is the problem of reconstruction when the war is over. The questions which will then necessarily arise in regard to women's labor and women's functions and activities in the new ordering of things—for, do not doubt it, the old order will be changed—the questions in regard to which I, for my part, feel it impossible, consistently either with justice or with expediency, to withhold from women the power and the right of making their voice directly heard.

The greater respect for the claims of women to a share in government which the war has brought the world around has resulted in remarkable actual gains.

SUFFRAGE ADVANCE IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES, 1917.

Great Britain: Premier Lloyd-George on behalf of the Liberal Party has pledged the parliamentary vote to British women (all other electoral rights were extended long ago), and by a vote of 7 to 1 the measure passed the House of Commons in June. It is expected that the bill will be through the House of Lords and receive the King's signature before the middle of February. Lloyd-George said, "To give the women no voice would be an outrage; it would be unjust, inequitable. That is why the woman question has become largely a war question."

Canada: Five Provinces within the last two years have extended full suffrage to women by acts of their legislatures, and in September a bill was passed by the Dominion Parliament giving the parliamentary vote to all women who are mothers, wives, widows, sisters, or daughters of soldiers, making the parliamentary vote practically universal, except for those of alien-enemy birth naturalized since 1902. Premier Robert Borden has pledged full suffrage.

In Mexico, in November, 1917, the State of Guanajuato conferred the privilege of suffrage in all municipal matters upon women of reputable character.

In France a suffrage commission appointed by the Chamber of Deputies has brought in a favorable report on woman suffrage, declaring that women should have the vote "first of all as an act of delayed justice and secondly as a move dictated by public interests." The measure is now pending.

Bohemia: The city of Prague has appointed a commission with instructions to bring in a new plan of franchise for the city, including woman suffrage.

Hungary: The city of Budapest unanimously demanded of the Hungarian Parliament suffrage for men and for women, and the minister of justice has pledged the party in power to grant the petition.

Italy: The premier of Italy, on behalf of the majority party, has pledged municipal suffrage for women.

Sweden: All the Scandinavian countries, except Sweden—that is, Finland, Norway, Denmark, and Iceland—have universal suffrage for both men and women. The King of Sweden has recommended full suffrage for women of that country, where they have long enjoyed municipal suffrage, and the Premier of the Liberal Party now in power has pledged his party to grant it.

Belgium: The King of Belgium has said that if ever his kingdom is restored to him one of his first acts will be to see that the women are enfranchised as a reward for the wonderful service they have rendered to their country in its time of stress.

Germany: Woman suffrage was recently proposed in the Imperial Reichstag as a reward for the war service of the women and was debated.

While other nations are fighting for their very lives in the world war for democracy, they have found time to take steps toward its establishment at home. Yet those nations are supposed to be more conservative than ours, and most of them are pledged to institutions that are more or less monarchial rather than democratic.

The Congress of the United States has not acted upon this question; it can pass the question on to the States. That is the purpose of this proposed amendment. For the Congress of the supposedly most democratic country in the world to refuse to take this action, to block the progress of democracy at home while professing to fight for it abroad, would be so high handed a performance as to fill the world with suspicions of our purposes in the war. To deny the States the opportunity to establish woman suffrage if they wish to do so is an act of autocratic injustice which would certainly be misunderstood abroad and would deeply incense the millions of women who are voters as well as the millions more who are petitioning for the vote. The opinions of millions of men and women are expressed in an editorial of the Los Angeles Times of December 24, 1917:

The women of the States where equal suffrage now prevails have fully justified their claim to the ballot. The game of politics is played more cleanly and occupies a higher plane than before women were permitted to vote; and the part which the women of America have taken in the war crisis proves incontestably that they are qualified both mentally and temperamentally to assist in the direction of the destinies of the Nation. To oppose longer the right of equal suffrage is simply to play the rôle of illogical obstructionist.

The West wants the opportunity of ratifying the Federal suffrage amendment and thus to stop delay in the establishment of this measure of democratic justice. Gov. Lister, of Washington, calls attention to the fact that the legislature of that State by joint memorial asked Congress to submit the amendment, and that the State is ready to ratify it. Gov. Stewart, of Montana, wires, "I hope the Federal amendment will pass. Montana is for woman suffrage."

The governor of Wyoming wires, "After 40 years' experience with woman suffrage Wyoming enthusiastically and unqualifiedly recommends the adoption by the Nation of the Federal woman-suffrage amendment."

Gov. Gunter, of Colorado, wires, "Woman suffrage has been beneficial to Colorado and I recommend the extension to the women of the Nation."

Gov. Capper, of Kansas, wires, "Woman suffrage has been an unqualified success in Kansas. I hope Congress will pass the Federal suffrage amendment and give the woman of the Nation the right to vote, a right which should never have been denied them."

Gov. Boyle says Nevada's people "want to see suffrage established Nation wide as part of Federal Constitution."

"Idaho is in favor of national enfranchisement of our women. It is in favor of the Federal suffrage amendment, woman suffrage having worked in Idaho so satisfactorily that we believe its benefits should be Nation wide," wires Gov. Alexander.

Oregon's governor, James Withycombe, wires that he is a strong advocate of the Federal suffrage amendment.

"The Utah Legislature, by unanimous vote, recommended the adoption of an amendment to the National Constitution granting woman suffrage. I heartily concur in this recommendation and feel that such an amendment will be favorably acted upon by Congress," reads the telegram signed by Gov. Simon Bamberger.

"The people of Arizona have already ratified an amendment to the State constitution giving full suffrage to both sexes alike. I regard such ratification as an index to the manner in which the people of this State would receive a Federal amendment providing for universal suffrage," wires Gov. W. P. Hunt.

Gov. Whitman, of New York, says: "I believe that the proposed Federal amendment providing for equal suffrage should be passed, and I believe, too, in the event of its passage that it will be ratified by at least three-fourths of the States. The State of New York by an overwhelming majority has given the vote to its women, and I think that it is the wish of our people that our Representatives in Congress should support this measure."

The Legislature of California in session in 1917, both houses concurring, unanimously passed a joint resolution, which reads as follows:

Assembly joint resolution 22, relative to urging Congress to submit to the legislatures of the States for their ratification an amendment to the United States Constitution granting women the right to vote.

Whereas the women of the United States are being called upon to share the burden and sacrifice incidental to the present national crisis; and Whereas they are patriotically responding to that call: Be it

Resolved, That denial of the right of women to vote in any part of the Nation on equal terms with the men is an injustice; and be it further

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring therein), That we do urge upon Congress the submission to the legislatures of the States for their ratification an amendment to the United States Constitution granting women the right to vote.

In other words, the people who have seen woman suffrage in operation, who know what it is and how it works, recommend it whole-heartedly to the rest of the country, and those who are blocking its progress are those who do not know what it is nor how it works but are governed by preconceived notions emanating from traditional prejudice.

The fact that the soldier vote of New York went 2 to 1 for suffrage should not be forgotten. These men, or those of them who come back, will be our Congressmen, our governors, and so forth, a few years hence. To vote with them on this question now is not to be regarded by them later as bigots and obstructionists.

It should be remembered the suffrage amendment is only a referendum. Those who vote for it are not committed to woman suffrage; they are merely committed to the proposition that they are willing to grant the States an opportunity to act. Those who vote against it are obstructing this movement which has already so far succeeded that 10,000,000 women of voting age live under woman-suffrage laws.

In 1916, 91 electoral votes were controlled jointly by men and women, and it was commonly admitted that women in the Western States played an important rôle in deciding the election. During the year 1917 the number of electoral votes cast by equal-suffrage States grew from 91 to 193. These voting women, as well as the millions of nonvoting petitioners, are certain to be deeply incensed if the same Congress which referred prohibition to the States refuses equally fair treatment to woman suffrage.

It must be borne in mind that it was the Nation, not the States, which declared war, conscripted men, voted a necessarily huge war tax, and has taken over the control of food and fuel. It is the Nation which has appealed to women to take the places of men, to give their money, their labor, their sons. All these things which but a few months ago seemed impossible have happened, and the Nation is engaged in the greatest war of its history—a war for democracy.

This crisis of our Nation calls for bolder action than would have been necessary a year ago. We can not consistently profess to lead in a war for democracy and be the last nation to establish it at home. Nor can we claim that the Nation is fighting for democracy abroad and leave the States to demonstrate our understanding of democracy at home. The loyal votes of women who would vote in the places of absent men are a national concern. The war has made woman suffrage a national question. The Congress should treat it as such.

The Congressmen who called on him to ask his advice were advised very frankly and earnestly by President Wilson to vote for the amendment "as an act of right and justice to the women of the country and of the world."

The women of America will be grateful to President Wilson for his advice and consequent great assistance in their cause, and the Members of the House can well afford to follow such advice.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has used 13 minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I also yield the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, House joint resolution No. 200 is entitled "Proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women," and provides for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the several States from refusing to permit women to vote in any and all elections.

Section 2 of this resolution provides: "Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article." Here the authority is conferred to enable the Government of the United States to take charge of every election held in the most remote precinct of every State in this Union, and to override and nullify every constitutional provision and statute in each of the States of this Union enacted to protect the purity and sanctity of the ballot. All these constitutional provisions and legislative enactments in each of the States are subordinated, subverted, and submerged to the will of the Federal Government by the terms of this proposed amendment. We are told that this revolutionary proposition must be engrafted upon the organic law of this Nation, because the people in different States of this Union have voted down proposed amendments to their State constitutions, conferring the right to vote upon women in those Commonwealths. The only reasons which can be assigned for proposing this amendment are: (1) The qualifications of voters are defined in the constitutions of the several States, and any change proposed therein must be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors. (2) By submitting this proposed amendment to the legislatures of the several States, instead of to constitutional conventions called for the purpose of passing upon it, the purpose to prevent even an indirect expression of the people on the amendment is apparent. The advocates of this amendment have a legal opinion from their counsel to the effect that even in those States which have constitutional provisions authorizing a referendum upon all legislation, a referendum can not be invoked upon the action of a State legislature in ratifying this amendment. The real underlying motive, then, for this proposed amendment is to override the action of the people of a number of the States, at the polls, by an appeal to Congress and the legislatures of other States.

This joint resolution is a naked and impudent repudiation of both the letter and spirit of the last national platforms adopted by the two leading political parties in this Nation, and every man on this floor, elected as a Democrat or Republican, who did not in the last campaign openly repudiate the platform of his party on this question is guilty of an act of bad faith in voting for this joint resolution. The Democratic national platform adopted at St. Louis, June 16, 1916, reads on suffrage as follows:

> We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

Here is a plain and unequivocal recognition of the right of each State to control the question of suffrage in accordance with the wishes of the people of the several individual States. The Republican national platform adopted at Chicago on June 10, 1916, deals with this proposed joint resolution in the following terms:

> The Republican Party, reaffirming its faith in Government of the people, by the people, for the people, as a measure of justice to one-half the adult people of the country, favors the extension of suffrage to women, but recognizes the right of each State to settle this question for itself.

If this language is not a plain, unequivocal, and emphatic recognition of the right of each State to settle and determine the question of woman suffrage for itself, then there are no words in the English language that would fairly express that purpose. Any Congressman on the floor of this House elected as a Democrat or a Republican who did not in the campaign in which he was last a candidate publicly repudiate this plank in his party's platform is morally bound to vote against this joint resolution. There is not in the Constitution or laws of the United States a single restriction, limitation, or obstruction to prevent, hinder, or delay the adoption of woman suffrage by any State in this Union. If any such obstruction existed, I would vote to remove it. Because the suffrage leaders in some of the large States of this Union have not been able to convince a majority of the electors of those States that woman suffrage ought to be adopted, or that even a majority of the women in those States favor it, these women rush down here to Washington and ask the Congress of the United States, by a species of legislative force and violence embodied in this joint resolution, to override and nullify the action of their own State by the aid of the legislatures of other States and their Representatives in Congress. Permit me to call attention to the history of my own State upon this question. In 1912 we held a constitutional convention in Ohio, which promulgated and submitted to a vote of the people of the State certain amendments, one of which authorized women to vote at all elections. It was defeated. In 1914 this same amendment was again submitted, and in the largest vote ever cast in the State up to that time this amendment was again voted down by a majority of 182,905 votes. These elections would seem to have established the fact that, whatever the sentiment in other States of the Union, the people of Ohio, both men and women, were opposed to granting the women of that State the right to vote. In the spring of 1917 a bill was introduced in the legislature of our State to confer upon women the authority to vote for and thereby join in the appointment of presidential electors. The broad power conferred upon the States by the Federal Constitution would seem to warrant the selection of presidential electors in any manner that the legislatures of the States might deem wise. This language is as follows:

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of [presidential] electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

Standing alone, this language of the Federal Constitution would seem to permit the legislatures of the several States to authorize the red-headed women alone in those States to appoint presidential electors, but the framers of the Ohio constitution concluded it would not be wise to leave such broad powers in the general assembly of our State, so a provision was inserted in our State constitution adopted in 1851 that "No person shall be appointed or elected to any office in this State who is not an elector," and in the same instrument the term "elector" is defined as "male white citizens 21 years old." The authority conferred by the legislatures of the several States to join in the appointment of presidential electors, either at elections or in any other way, is unquestionably an office which is defined as "a special duty, trust, charge, or position conferred by an exercise of governmental authority and for a public purpose." A majority of each branch of the legislature of Ohio yielded to the clamor and importunities of the same men and women who are in Washington now attempting to force woman suffrage on the State of Ohio by a Federal constitutional amendment and passed the measure authorizing women to vote for presidential electors. A referendum upon this measure was invoked by the constitutional number of electors of our State, and at the November election in 1917 this Reynolds bill authorizing women to join with men in the appointment of presidential electors in Ohio was defeated by 146,120 majority. This most recent action of the electors of Ohio, of course, furnishes, from the standpoint of these militant suffragists, an additional argument why this constitutional amendment ought to be adopted, because it seems to demonstrate the failure to procure woman suffrage in Ohio with the consent of the people of that State.

In addition to the pending joint resolution and others of similar tenor and effect, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] have introduced bills entitled, "A bill to protect the rights of women citizens of the United States to register and vote for Senators of the United States and for Members of the House of Representatives," and then these bills attempt to confer by legislative enactment of Congress authority upon the women of all the States of this Union to vote for United States Senators and Members of the United States House of Representatives. These bills were recently referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage of the House, and, being desirous of learning what it was the purpose of this committee to do with these bills, I called upon the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] after the bills had been referred to her committee and asked her what the committee proposed to do with them. She replied in substance that the action of the committee on these bills would depend upon the action of the House on the joint resolution now pending.

In other words, if the Congress of the United States refuses to pass this joint resolution to amend the Constitution, this Committee on Woman Suffrage proposes to pass one of these bills in violation of the Constitution as a measure of reprisal against the Congress and people of the United States.

We are threatened by these militant suffragettes with a direct and lawless invasion by the Congress of the United States of the rights of those States which have refused to confer upon their women the privilege of voting. This attitude on the part of some of the suffrage Members of this House is on an exact equality with the acts of these women militants who have spent the last summer and fall, while they were not in the District jail or workhouse, in coaxing, teasing, and nagging the President of the United States for the purpose of inducing him by coercion to club Congress into adopting this joint resolution. [Cries of "They got it!"] Last Saturday one of these suffrage crusaders declared before the Woman Suffrage Committee of the House that unless Congress enacts this pending joint resolution they intend to renew their seige of the White House and keep it up until the occupant surrenders to them. They forget the admonition which one of their orators gave to the chairman of the Woman Suffrage Committee [Mr. RAKER]: To see the President in behalf of this joint resolution, and if he was for it to advertise that fact, but that if he declared against it to tell him it is none of his official business, anyway. [Laughter.] This same militant Amazon from Iowa in this same speech declared that the only way they could get woman suffrage in Iowa was through the action of Congress and the State legislatures by constitutional amendment, because the qualifications of electors in Iowa are defined by the constitution, and the people of that State had voted down a woman's suffrage amendment and the legislature could not reverse the action of the people at the polls. She explained that the people of Iowa had also voted down State-wide prohibition, but that the legislature enacted it. What the State of Iowa needs worse than anything else is a lot of first-class political funerals among their Members of Congress and State legislature. [Laughter.] The people of Iowa ought to change their minds on the subject of prohibition and woman suffrage or change their representatives in Congress and in the legislature of their State. [Laughter.]

Now, the President of the United States has no more to do officially with the adoption of a joint resolution providing for a constitutional amendment than has Carrie Chapman Catt. The action of these militants in besieging the President's official residence with pikes and banners for the purpose of procuring the adoption of this joint resolution is not only an insult to Senators and Congressmen, who are the only United States officials charged with any duty or responsibility in the matter, but it is a reflection upon the President himself, who repeatedly declared before his last election, and which was declared in the platform upon which he was reelected, to be a question for each State to decide for itself. Mr. Wilson did not, like his opponent, repudiate the platform upon which he was running for President in 1916, and having been reelected upon a platform which recognized the right of each State to control the question of suffrage for itself. I say it is an insult for any man or woman to ask or expect the President to use his influence with Congressmen and Senators to induce them to violate the platforms upon which they were elected.

It is only a few years ago that the resounding voice of a presidential candidate was heard throughout the land, propounding the inquiry, "Shall the people rule?" This same man has been in Washington during the present session of Congress, urging Members to prevent the people of their States from ruling on the question of prohibition and woman's suffrage by forcing these policies on them by constitutional amendment through Congress and the State legislatures of other States. Nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States prevents a single State in the Union from granting suffrage to its women, and if there is any obstacle in the constitution or laws of any State a majority of the people of that State can remove it. This joint resolution ought to be entitled: "A bill to take from the people of the States control over an important matter and vest it in the legislatures of three-fourths of the States." It ought to be defeated, and I hope and believe it will be, here or elsewhere.

In a recent decision by the Supreme Court of Indiana, adjudging null and void an act of the State legislature attempting to authorize women to vote for certain candidates for office, the court said:

> The right of suffrage is not a natural or inherent right, but a political privilege, and it is held only by those on whom it is bestowed, either by virtue of express constitutional grant or through authorized legislative provision. The question is primarily one for the consideration of the people in their capacity as creators of the constitution, and is never one for the consideration of the legislature, except in so far as that instrument clearly sanctions an extension of the elective franchise or permits a regulation of its mode of exercise.

The lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] has introduced a joint resolution in this House recognizing the right of Ireland to home rule and political independence, but she is unwilling to permit the people of Ohio to have home rule in their domestic affairs, but by her voice and vote as a Member of this House is attempting to deprive them of it. The people of my State have always sympathized with the desire of the people of Ireland for home rule, but we demand it for Ohio and for every other State in this Union as a matter of right. These vociferous advocates of home rule for foreign nations and peoples ought to apply their principles to their own people, for home rule, like charity, ought to begin at home.

Mr. Speaker, there is very much more involved in this joint resolution than the principle, bad as it is, of coercing the people of a number of States into granting to women the privilege of voting at elections. The exercise of this power involves the assertion of the right by constitutional amendment to overturn, alter, amend, and repeal the taxation laws, the school laws, the statutes of descent and distribution of real and personal property, and numberless other local laws and institutions which were deeply rooted in such old States as Virginia and Massachusetts many years before the Federal Government was organized. To protect the States from the possible invasion of these rights by the Federal Government the tenth amendment was adopted concurrently with the Constitution itself, by which it was solemnly asserted that—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

This amendment was designed and intended to declare and define the relations between the States and Federal Government, and it was only because their relative rights and powers were so designated and generally understood that a Union was agreed upon. If any considerable number of people, prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, had asserted the right and power of three-fourths of the States to usurp by constitutional amendment jurisdiction and control over purely local matters, the Constitution would never have been ratified by the requisite number of States. The right to vote is a privilege, coupled with a duty and responsibility, which in free States is vested in those of its citizens who may be trusted to exercise it wisely for the general welfare; it is not, as so many of our militant friends so vociferously assert, a right inherent in the citizen like the right to life, liberty, and property. If a voter sells his vote, the law condemns him to penal servitude in the penitentiary for the betrayal of a public trust reposed in him by his fellow citizens to be exercised solely for their benefit, in accordance with his best judgment, which it is unlawful for him to delegate to another. Our woman-suffrage friends, who contend so glibly that all human beings have an inherent and inalienable right to vote and that they have been deprived of this "right" by "man-made" laws, are, of course, driven to the extremity of conceding the same "right" to all other human beings, hence we hear the most fantastic arguments adduced in support of laws permitting parents to vote their children, guardians of imbeciles and lunatics their wards, and mothers their babes in arms, and so forth.

I would not vote to deprive any woman of the voting privilege she now enjoys by the action of her own State, but Members of Congress before voting for this joint resolution ought to weigh and consider all the consequences involved in such action. You are invading the jurisdiction of many States against the protest of their own citizens upon a matter of local or State concern and upon a subject concerning which you can not claim any special or superior knowledge. What do Members of Congress know about the qualifications of citizens, men or women, in remote States, to exercise the elective franchise? They know still less about the state of public sentiment where no election on the subject has been held.

In the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, South Dakota, and Texas aliens are permitted to vote after having declared their intention to become American citizens and after having been residents of the States the required time, usually six months; and, therefore, we have the anomalous situation of hundreds of thousands of alien enemies in these States voting at all elections. Although final naturalization will be refused to them during the period of the war, they are excluded by law from military service, from suing in the courts, and some of them are confined in internment camps. If this joint resolution shall be adopted by Congress and approved by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, the practical effect of it will be to place the ballot in the hands of many thousands more of alien enemies who are under the disabilities above described.

In the summer of 1915 I attended a luncheon of the Ohio Woman's Suffrage Association and occupied a seat next to the president, who has held that office for 13 years continuously. She is one of the best educated and most accomplished women in our State. I asked her if she believed that since woman's suffrage had been rejected in Ohio by more than 180,000 majority, I, as a Representative from that State, ought to go to Washington and attempt to force it on them by Federal amendment. She answered, "No." I asked her further if she did not believe that whenever a majority of the women in Ohio desired to vote, the men would grant them that privilege. She answered, "Yes." And yet this lady is now here in Washington with an opinion of her lawyers to the effect that if this joint resolution passes and the legislature of our State ratifies this amendment, such action can not be submitted to a vote of the people under the initiative and referendum provision of our State Constitution, and she is urging that Congress enact this joint resolution. Because childish and imbecile arguments are adduced in favor of a proposition, does not prove that it is wrong or unwise, but it raises an implication that sound reasons are lacking. We are told that because the men of the Nation are being mobilized in training camps and rushed to Europe to defend the rights of this Nation, the women ought to be rushed into the voting booths to take their places there. The logic of this argument is that because the men are required to defend with arms in their hands the rights of our people under international law, the women ought, with their well-known pacifist tendencies, to be armed with the ballot in order that they may vote for a treaty of peace, dictated by the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs. I have been told that by voting against this resolution I am showing disrespect to the memory of my mother. The only suggestion my mother ever made to me on the subject of woman's suffrage was that she hoped I would not aid in forcing this additional duty and responsibility upon the mothers of this land, because it would add enormously to the already too large number of ignorant and incompetent voters. Do not be misled into believing that the shrill and strident voice of the militant suffragette is the voice of the people or the voice of God.

When Elijah stood upon the mountain top listening for the voice of the Lord, we are told in Holy Writ that the Lord was not in the wind. He was not in the earthquake. He was not in the fire, but in the still, small voice which followed these convulsions of nature. If the Members of this House will heed the "still small voice" of reason, justice, and common sense and permit their votes to be controlled by their conscientious convictions of public duty, they will defeat this joint resolution. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, I am still "standing with the President," or, in other words, the President this morning is standing with me. [Applause.]

Last night the President met his party in conference and advised them to vote to-day for woman suffrage as "an act of right and justice to the women of the country and of the world." At the same hour the Republican Members of this House were also in conference and voted by a large majority to stand by that part of the plank in the last Republican national platform which said:

> The Republican Party, reaffirming its faith in government of the people, by the people, for the people, as a measure of justice to one-half the adult people of the country, favors the extension of the suffrage to women.

Woman has conquered. She has met every test and answered every argument, and now demands from this Congress simple justice. It is justice long delayed. The greatest logician that ever lived was John Stuart Mill. His wonderful work on logic is the textbook of every great college in the world. Fifty years ago he wrote a wonderful book on "The Subjection of Woman." In that book he carefully considered every possible argument for and against woman suffrage. He gave to that consideration calm, cold, and merciless logic, and he arrived at the following conclusions:

> The legal subordination of one sex to the other is wrong in itself, and now one of the chief hindrances to human improvement; it ought to be replaced by a principle of perfect equality, admitting no power or privilege on the one side nor disability on the other.
> To have a voice in choosing those by whom one is governed is a means of self-protection due to everyone. Under whatever conditions and within whatever limits men are admitted to the suffrage there is not a shadow of justification for not admitting women under the same.

Mill has never been answered. He never will be answered. All the arguments of logic and reason have for the last half century been settled in favor of the enfranchisement of women.

But there were those who said "Mill's logic is all right, but he stands for a theory in government that has never been put to practice. Experience will show that women should not have the ballot," and since that time we have had fully demonstrated the argument from experience.

Forty-nine years ago Wyoming gave to her women equal suffrage, and year by year since then State after State of the great western world has enfranchised her women until 11 States, side by side, have full suffrage and 18 States to-day have presidential suffrage. Never one of these States has for a moment thought of returning to the old way. Never a legislature has resubmitted the question to the voters. The women of these States have never asked to be again returned to slavery. Representatives from these States are sitting to-day in this Congress. They are a fine body of men, intelligent, patriotic, and honest. They are the equal of any of the other States in the Union, and every one of these Representatives will tell you that they are proud of the suffrage given to their women; that experience has shown the wisdom of the act; that nothing would induce them to return to the time when the ballot was given only to the male voters. This argument from experience is conclusive; it can not be answered by the absurd claim that evil would result from now placing the ballot in the hands of American women.

But there are those to-day in this House who invoke the old, discarded doctrine of State rights and say that woman suffrage has no place in the Constitution; that it should be settled by the States. Every one of these arguments could have been more forceably invoked against all the 17 amendments to our national Constitution, and with a great deal more reason and logic than against the present amendment now before Congress.

Another says you had an election down in Maine last September, and your State defeated woman suffrage. Why should you here on the floor of Congress after that advocate the passage of this amendment? I answer that the election in Maine settled nothing, but only proves the inability of a State to settle this matter by submitting it to the voters at a special election.

In the last State election in my State for governor there were cast over 150,000 votes. At this special election for woman suffrage only 58,000 voted. In other words, 92,000 male voters of my State were afflicted with political indifference and did not go to the ballot box. Of the one-third who voted, the majority were induced to vote against woman suffrage by false testimony and an appeal to their prejudices. Before that election all over my State, at the leading hotels the political leaders of both parties were given banquets by those opposed to woman suffrage, and somebody paid the bills. I do not know who, and at those banquets there was provided a speaker, who was advertised to come from one of the suffrage States of the West, an unknown, smooth of tongue and polished of manner, who claimed to the banqueters that he lived in a State that had given the ballot to women and that the people of his State were disgusted and dissatisfied with their act enfranchising the women; that experience had shown that the women did not want the ballot; that they did not vote at the elections; that a great many evils had grown up by giving the ballot to women, and so forth, and under the influence of a good dinner these men accepted the ex parte testimony of this unknown and were induced to go to the ballot box and give a verdict on such false testimony, when every governor of these States and every Representative and Senator and every public man of any note and influence was eager to give the lie to such statements. And while these dinners were being served hired speakers from out the State were going from place to place in the country towns appealing to the patriotic impulses of the people to stand by the President and against picketing at the White House, and claiming that if the ballot was given to the women of Maine the pickets at the White House would continue during the war, and these appeals to prejudice caused a sufficient number to defeat woman suffrage. Such arguments could not prevail in our legislature. Such witnesses would never be tolerated there. After the election in Maine, New York State met these arguments, exposed their falseness, and from an adverse verdict of over 200,000 two years ago New York voted in favor of woman suffrage by a majority of over 90,000.

A few days before the New York election that approved suffrage the New York Tribune published as a matter of news the following:

> WOMEN WHO NEED THE VOTE PLEAD FOR EQUAL SUFFRAGE—LAUNDRY, KITCHEN, AND SWEATSHOP WORKERS, POORLY CLAD, FACE 10,000 MEN IN UNION SQUARE AND SHOW WHY THEY SHOULD HAVE FRANCHISE.
> Up from the laundries and the kitchens, from the sweatshops and the factories, the working women came yesterday to plead with the men of New York for the vote. Much has been said of the need of the ballot to remedy conditions for the working women, but usually the working woman has had to keep on working and let some one else do the talking for her. Yesterday she came herself.
> Pale, undersized, meanly clad, the women who need the vote climbed a rickety ladder leading to a platform erected on the north side of Union Square and faced a crowd of 10,000 men. Then in a series of "living pictures," they told the story of woman's place in the industrial world.

Down in Maine both political parties indorsed suffrage in their platforms, and then never lifted a finger at the election to put it into the constitution. In New York State both political parties indorsed not only woman suffrage in convention but worked and voted for it on the day of election, and they won. Maine's legislature is ready to-day to indorse this amendment, but she is not satisfied with this special election which settled nothing.

As a Representative from Maine, I am unwilling that the great States of New York and Illinois should double their voting population while Maine is shorn of her power. The suffrage States to-day control 163 electoral votes for President. What influence will Maine and other nonsuffrage States in New England have in the next presidential campaign if their women remain unfranchised?

Thomas B. Reed, of my State, ex-Speaker of this House, who submitted every argument to the court of common sense, said of woman suffrage:

> If suffrage be right, if it be true that no man has a claim to govern any other man, except to the extent that the other man has a right to govern him, then there can be no discussion of the question of woman suffrage. No reason on earth can be given by those who claim suffrage as a right of manhood which does not make it a right of womanhood also.

The late Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, said:

We have driven our leading opponents from one position to another until there is not a thoughtful opponent of woman suffrage to be found who is not obliged to deny the doctrine which is affirmed in our Declaration of Independence.

The late Hon. John D. Long, ex-governor of Massachusetts and Secretary of the Navy, put the argument for woman suffrage in a nutshell when he said:

I have never heard an argument against woman suffrage that was not an insult against the intelligence of a 10-year-old boy. If one man or woman wants to exercise the right to vote, what earthly reason is there for denying it because other men and women do not wish to exercise it?

If I desire to breathe the fresh air of Heaven, shall I not cross my threshold because the rest of the family group prefer the stale atmosphere indoors? When the Government extends the principle of voting to a citizen it says to him, "We do not compel you to appear at the polls; we simply give you the liberty to vote or not to vote, as you desire. You may express your consent or your protest against conditions, and you may help make civilization if you wish." On the other hand, when the Government refuses the privilege, it says, "We compel you to remain away from the ballot box. Whether you wish to vote or not, you shall not. We will impose upon you any laws which we see fit, and you shall have no official authority to protest or to consent."

Human ingenuity can not suggest a single distinction between the sexes so far as the right of voting is concerned. They are equally intelligent so far as the intelligence to vote is concerned. They are equally competent to judge of the merits of measures and the comparative merits of candidates. * * * If it is a right, why should it be denied? When yet in the history of the world has it been found that what is right is inexpedient?

The New York World, of October 28 last, said:

The case for woman suffrage rests upon a fundamental principle of democracy, the right of the governed to have a voice in their government. Women have the same kind of a stake in government that men have. In modern civilization there is practically no sheltered woman who lives apart from her times. She may exist in the fiction of novelists and in the fiction of the common law, and there may be an instance now and then of complete feminine isolation from the current of events, just as there are men and women who live in monasteries and convents; but the Government affects most of us in the same way regardless of sex, and civilization that compels women to be wage earners has destroyed the last argument against their voting.

And so one by one, every argument either from reason, logic, or experience has been decided in favor of woman, and here to-day on this floor everyone admits that if this amendment is submitted by Congress it will be adopted by the States. Here to-day everyone admits that there is no argument against woman suffrage and we only differ as to methods, as to whether woman suffrage shall be given by a Federal amendment or be delayed and defeated by special elections in the several States.

The American woman stands before us to-day with every argument in her favor and she demands of us only justice.

It has been well said that "There is something grander than benevolence, more august than charity. It is justice," and that "justice delayed is justice denied."

The Sacred Record gives us an apt example of justice denied:

Then said Pilate unto Him, * * * "knowest Thou not that I have power to crucify Thee, and have power to release Thee?"

Pilate therefore went forth again, and saith unto them, "Behold, I bring Him forth to you that ye may know that I find no fault in Him."

When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, "I am innocent of the blood of this Just Person; see ye to it."

And Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required.

And when he had scourged Jesus he delivered him to be crucified.

It is not up to the President. The responsibility can not be shifted to our political party or to the revival of State rights. The Members of this Congress have the responsibility and the power. We, too, can say to the women of this country as Pilate said of old, "Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee and power to release thee?"

We must meet this responsibility. We can not deny women justice and then wash our hands in the waters of State rights.

Woman does not ask you for praise; she does not demand flattery. She begs of you not to ridicule her further, but to let her have in the battle of life the same weapons of defense that you possess; to let her stand and work by your side, your equal, your companion in the battle of life. She asks only and simply justice.

For all mankind one Christ has sighed
Upon the cross; but hourly
Is every woman crucified!

O sons of mothers, shall the pain
Of all childbearing be in vain?
Shall we drive nails, to wound her thus,
Into the hands that fondled us?

In this Capitol sits the greatest court and most august judicial tribunal in the world—the Supreme Court of the United States. One of the greatest minds that ever graced that tribunal was the late Justice Brewer, of this city. Shortly before his death he reviewed woman suffrage from the standpoint of the judge. He submitted her case to the judicial mind. He reviewed all the arguments for and against her and summed up the case in her favor in the following eloquent language:

Female suffrage will come; woman's broader education, her increasing familiarity with business and public affairs, will lead to it; and why not?

The chief reply is the home. God forbid that it should be jeopardized. But female suffrage will not debase the home or lessen its power and influence. On the other hand, it will introduce a refining and uplifting power into our political life.

Union in effort is the growing lesson of the times. Our first parents, guilty of a mutual sin, were, according to the allegory in Genesis, driven out of Eden, that garden which gave men all things to live with and nothing to live for. Hand in hand they went out of Eden; hand in hand they must enter the new paradise, grander and nobler than the pristine Eden, because wrought out of the thorn-growing earth by their united labors.

This is the case for woman suffrage. I submit that it meets every argument; that it justifies the affirmative action of every Representative; that it calls for our votes in favor of this amendment as an act of justice to woman. We can not vote against woman suffrage and go out into the world and meet the eyes of women when we have denied them justice. How can I go down Pennsylvania Avenue to my home and meet the 10,000 women who, early in the morning, throng our streets on their way to do the work of the men in the departments, in the shops, and in the industries when I have denied them justice? How can I meet the eyes of the women in the munition factories and in the homes who are fighting the battle for life and bread to keep the home fires burning while the men are at war? Three-fourths of the teachers in our public schools are women. How can I meet them after I have denied them the ballot? Ten million women are out in the ranks of industry, loyally supporting the country, doing all the work that men could do to preserve our institutions and our flag and give democracy to the world. If I cross the ocean and go upon the present battle fields, there I will find the Red Cross women in the hospitals, in the ambulances, thousands on the battle fields, risking their lives standing by man's side in this great world war. I can not vote against her and meet those silent patient eyes when I have denied her justice; and so to-day I stand—

For equal rights,
For human weal,
For nobler aim,
For laws that heal
The wounds of tyrants.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, when the woman-suffrage amendment was before the House, January 12, 1915, I stated my position as follows:

Mr. Speaker, woman suffrage is another of the questions which the younger States of the Union are passing up for acceptance to the older and more populous States. The Legislature of Pennsylvania has partially indicated its purpose to submit this question to a vote of the people of the State. Thus far, apart from the preliminary step taken by the legislature, we have had no real expression from the body of the people of the State upon the subject, and we can not have until further action is taken by the legislature. It is therefore impossible at this time to say definitely whether Pennsylvania approves of the wisdom or desirability of woman suffrage. We are not assured that a majority of the women themselves desire it. Some of them oppose it bitterly upon the ground that it will tend to degrade rather than exalt the womanhood of the State. Women who hold this view contend that in America no such social or legal inequalities as are said to prevail in England and other European countries exist. There is also a considerable feeling amongst the women opposed to suffrage that the high place which American women now hold in the esteem of manly men may be prejudicially affected by forcing upon all women, regardless of their domestic relations, the responsibility that would be imposed by the voting power. While I recognize the "right" of mothers, wives, and single women, if they so desire, to inject themselves into the maelstrom of politics, even though the exercise of that "right" may tend to lessen the sacred preference which is already accorded to them by all true Americans, I do not believe I am authorized as a Representative to impose such responsibilities upon them now, nor until at least a majority of the people of Pennsylvania have indicated that such a course shall be pursued. I shall therefore vote against the resolution.

It will be recalled that the amendment was defeated in the House. Subsequently the question of woman suffrage, under an act of the legislature, was submitted to the people of Pennsylvania, and the amendment there was defeated by a majority of more than 55,000. In the third Pennsylvania district, which I represent, the majority against suffrage was overwhelming. Every one of the 11 wards gave a majority against. Without again discussing the merits of the proposition, and leaving open the question of right or wrong, or the further equally important question as to whether a majority of the women themselves desire suffrage, I do not feel warranted in ignoring the officially expressed sentiment of the voters of the district I represent. This was substantially the position I assumed when the question was before the House in January, 1915, before the vote had been taken in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, when I cast my vote against this resolution I shall have to stifle my personal inclinations, because if you were to ask me why the women in the United States, wherever they may live, should not vote. I would probably be unable to assign to you a sufficient reason, but there are several impelling reasons why I am not going to support this joint resolution. The first reason is because before I could get my name on the official ballot to be voted for as a Representative in Congress at the primaries I had to sign this declaration, as did every Republican Member of this House from the State of Ohio, as well as every Democratic Member from that State. It seems to me that we soon forget the pledges that we take, and this pledge was indeed a solemn one, because each one of us from Ohio, Democrats and Republicans alike, had to go before a notary public and sign it. I am not one of those who look upon this statutory obligation as "a mere scrap of paper":

I further declare that if nominated and elected I will qualify as such Representative and that I will support and abide by the principles enumerated by the Republican Party (or the Democratic Party, as the case may be) in its national platform and in its platform in the State adopted or to be adopted during the present year.

That declaration of candidacy was signed in the presence of an officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments, as solemn a declaration as a man can take, that if nominated and elected he would support each plank of the party platform to be adopted at the party convention. Men in this House from the State of Ohio seemingly have forgotten the pledge that they so solemnly took some 60 days before the primary election of 1916. That plank of the Republican platform read as follows:

The Republican Party, reaffirming its faith in government of the people, by the people, for the people, as a measure of justice to one-half the adult people of the country, favors the extension of the suffrage to women, but recognizes the right of each State to settle this question for itself.

And the Democratic as follows:

We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield? Is that a pledge or an oath?

Mr. KEARNS. It is a declaration made before an officer authorized to administer an oath. It is not sworn to, but I take it that gentlemen, when they go through the solemnity of going before such an officer and declaring that they will abide by the principles of the party as laid down in the National and State conventions, are not soon going to forget that. That is one of the great reasons why, as I stated in the beginning, I am compelled to stifle my own personal opinion on this great subject and vote against this resolution.

Mr. MEEKER. It is understood by the State that it is made upon a man's honor?

Mr. KEARNS. It is made not only upon his honor but he must reduce it to writing. He must sign in the presence of a notary public or other officer.

I know there are a great many good, loyal, and patriotic women in the State of Ohio who are able to cast just as intelligent a vote as can any Member of this body, but our party platform is against it, and until that barrier is raised I propose to remember the pledge that I have made, and I am going to vote against woman suffrage in this House until the party leaders in convention assembled relieve me of this obligation that I have taken. That I know will be soon. Both parties will, in the future, adopt national suffrage.

Three times the State in which I live has voted upon this subject. Each time I have voted in favor of woman suffrage, but as a Member of this body I can not do it, because my party has declared that it is a State issue and not a Federal issue. They have declared against this resolution. And so did the great Democratic Party at about the same time declare against it.

There is another reason why I am against this resolution. At the November election this fall in Ohio, we had a referendum on the question of woman suffrage. The question of suffrage lost in the State by a majority of about 145,000. In my district the majority against giving the vote to women lost in every county by overwhelming majorities. This, I take it, was a mandate to me as to what I should do here to-day. I am one of those who firmly believe that every man ought to represent the feelings and opinions of his constituency when he is advised what that opinion is. This may be old-fashioned, but I can not help but think that a Member of Congress ought to be guided, in part at least, by the judgment of his constituency when he knows absolutely what that judgment is. I can readily understand where a question may come up on the instant and the people at home have not the time or the opportunity to form a well-defined opinion on a subject that may be in this House. In that case I think it is well for the Representative to be guided by his own judgment. But this is a question that has been before the people of every State in the Union for many years. Men and women have had the opportunity to study the question from every angle, and in my State and in my district the mature judgment of the men is against this proposition, and I will have to be guided by their opinions as expressed at the last election. I know this will be very disappointing to a great many very fine ladies in the sixth district of Ohio for whose judgment and opinions I entertain the highest regard. But the law of my State is such, together with the expression of the voters at the recent election, as to estop me from doing otherwise.

I shall have to vote against this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. I wanted to say about the women of California, that they have the right to vote——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Wilson has declared against it——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. I beg your pardon. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not approve of or believe in picketing the White House, the National Capitol, or any other station to bring about votes for women. I do not approve of wild militancy, hunger strikes, and efforts of that sort. I do not approve of the course of those women that throw themselves in front of horses, become agitators, lay off their womanly qualities in their efforts to secure votes. I do not approve of anything unwomanly anywhere, any time, and my course to-day in supporting this suffrage amendment is not guided by such conduct on the part of a very few women here or elsewhere. [Applause.]

NO DANGER OF NEGRO DOMINATION IN THE SOUTH OR PETTICOAT DOMINATION IN THE NORTH.

Friends of mine in this House have doubts and forebodings as to the advisability of giving women the right to vote, fearful of negro domination in the South and petticoat domination in the North. I entertain no such fears.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not yield in the short time allotted.

If there were in fact danger of negro domination or if this amendment would contribute to it I, too, would feel apprehensive, for I have no disposition to inflict on that great southern country legislation that is obnoxious to them, offensive to them, or anything for which there is no adequate solution. But I pause and ask them now what is the answer to the question that the same educational test that now prevents the ignorant male voter, both white and black, from exercising the right of suffrage will at the same time deny the ignorant female voter the right? What is the answer to the question that the same poll-tax law that now largely prevents the ignorant male from voting will likewise prevent the ignorant female from voting? What is the answer to the statement that for every negro woman so enfranchised there will be hundreds and thousands of intelligent white women enfranchised? I can not share the doubts and forebodings of my friends from the North or South who are to-day opposing suffrage. I can not think either their doubts or their fears are well founded. [Applause.]

MINORITY OF GOOD WOMEN WHO OPPOSE SHOULD NOT OBSTRUCT MAJORITY OF GOOD WOMEN WHO DESIRE TO BE ENFRANCHISED.

We are told by the opponents of suffrage that there are many thousands of good women in the country who do not care to exercise the right to vote and are in fact opposed to giving the franchise to women. I do not deny this statement, but I answer it by saying that in my opinion there are but a small per cent of the 14,000,000 women affected by this amendment that are really and in fact opposed to granting suffrage. I also assert that they have no good or sufficient right to stand in the way of the major portion of the good women of the country who earnestly hope and pray that this right may be given to them. I answer it further by saying that if this amendment is passed to-day and later becomes the law and full franchise to women is given, it is not mandatory. No woman is compelled to exercise the right. It is merely a privilege which she may exercise or let alone at her option, at her pleasure, in her own way. How can this offend those who do not favor it—naught but pure selfishness would prompt one to deny to others a right they themselves did not desire.

NATIONAL PLATFORMS OF 1916 COMMITTED TO EQUAL SUFFRAGE FOR MEN AND WOMEN.

Much has been said here to-day regarding party platforms. The opponents of suffrage have said that the vote for this amendment was a betrayal of the party platform. The proponents of suffrage have said that to oppose it was a betrayal of party platform. This brings the provision of the platform into close scrutiny. My answer to this controversy is that each of the four political platforms in the 1916 election, judging them by any fair interpretation, provide emphatically for equal suffrage. Of course, a technical reading of them provides it is to be accomplished in a certain way, but, after all, I repeat a fair reading of these platforms can not but convince any fair-minded man that the four national political parties of this country are already well and unequivocally committed to equal suffrage for men and women. I shall not present all of these platforms but will content myself in presenting the 1916 Democratic platform under which Woodrow Wilson was triumphantly elected President of the United States. It is as follows:

We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

This provision of the Democratic platform is short—to the point—it answers all quibbles, all debates, all technical reasoning in connection with the proposition as to whether or not the Democratic Party is committed to suffrage.

CONFERRING OF SUFFRAGE ON WOMAN WILL NOT DEGRADE HER—WILL STRENGTHEN AND ENNOBLE HER.

I hear others during the course of this debate say that to confer the right of suffrage upon woman is but to degrade and debase her, but I deny any and all such arguments and assert them to be both fallacious and untrue. In the State of Wyoming suffrage has prevailed for almost a half century. I deny that the women are debased or mannish in Wyoming or that the men are mollycoddles. In the neighboring State of Colorado, where suffrage has been the accepted doctrine for many years, it has neither degraded the women nor feminized the men but it has strengthened and helped both sexes. It is true throughout the 18 States that have suffrage. [Applause.]

OPPONENTS JEER SUFFRAGE TO-DAY, BUT THEY FIRST JEERED ELECTION OF SENATORS BY POPULAR VOTE—THEY FIRST JEERED PROHIBITION AND OTHER REFORMS.

Opponents of equal suffrage to-day shrug their shoulders and jeer at the thought of enfranchising 14,000,000 American women. I can remember when the talk of election of Senators by a popular vote brought jeers from many of these same gentlemen—it brings no jeers to-day.

I can well remember when the subject of rural routes brought jeers through the newspapers of the country, brought jeers through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, brought jeers from the Members of Congress—it brings no jeers to-day. I can remember when the question of prohibition brought jeers—like the rest, it brings no jeers to-day. Woman suffrage to-day and in this debate has brought jeers from the opponents, but it, like the rest, will bring no jeers on the coming morrow, for the enfranchisement and gentling influences that come with responsibility of 14,000,000 women will and can not long be the subject of jeers by thoughtful people anywhere or at any time. [Applause.]

SUFFRAGE NOT MANDATORY—THOSE IN FAVOR OF IT MAY ENJOY IT—THOSE OPPOSED TO IT MAY LET IT ALONE.

We are told to-day by the opponents of suffrage that many women of the land will not exercise the right to vote even if it be given them, and in that they tell the truth. In my own State some 40,000 male voters each year fail to exercise the right. Still none will be so bold as to say because a few fail to exercise the right that it shall even be denied them, much less the denial of the right to those male electors who do desire to vote.

NO ADEQUATE ANSWER TO THE QUESTION—IF A GOOD WOMAN DESIRES TO VOTE, SHE SHOULD BE GIVEN THE RIGHT.

To me there is no answer to the question that if a good woman desires to vote, why should she not be given the right to do so? This question has not been answered in this debate to-day. It has not been answered in preceding debates. It will not be answered in succeeding debates, for there is no just and adequate answer to the question that if a good woman desires the right to vote it should be given to her. [Applause.]

SUFFRAGE A GREAT NATIONAL QUESTION—IT WILL NEVER BE SETTLED UNTIL IT IS SETTLED RIGHT.

No, Mr. Speaker, this question to-day is a great national issue—one involving the rights of our mothers, our wives, our daughters, our women. It will never be settled until it is settled right. Most of them have asked it with upturned face, feeling that it would benefit them, would help them, ennoble them, and strengthen them. It is ours to give or withhold. For me and mine, I am in favor of giving it to them ungrudgingly, first, because I believe it is right; second, because I can find no sound or satisfying argument, logic, or reason that would justify a course in opposition to it; third, in substance, in truth, and in fact, the four great political platforms of the last election promised equal suffrage to women as to men. True, they did not promise specifically by this particular avenue of a constitutional amendment, but in answering platforms made in haste I shall answer to the substance and not to the detail, believing as firmly as that I live that I am doing my duty as a citizen and as a Congressman, not only to womanhood and manhood but to mankind. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat surprised at the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]. He read the Republican platform on this suffrage question and argued that we Republicans are violating it, but he failed to read the Democratic platform on the same question, which his own party's President has just violated. Moreover, he did not tell you, as he should have done, if he wished to be fair to us, that the President has time and again argued against the Federal amendment when delegations called on him about the matter, as well as on other occasions, and has uniformly said that it is a State and not a national question, and that he was in favor of leaving it for the States to settle, and yet we are informed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] to-day that the President has changed front upon the question, abandoning the platform upon which he was elected, and now says this resolution proposing to submit to the States the question of a suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution ought to be adopted as a matter of right and justice to the women of the country. It is passing strange, Mr. Speaker, that the President should so suddenly change his mind on this proposition. I will not say that he changed it because he foresaw the passage of the resolution or that he realized that this side of the House was going to vote almost unanimously for it and tried to beat us to it, but it certainly is a rather funny proceeding. I am glad he has done this, especially if it will help to pass the resolution; but I do not think it becomes the gentleman from Ohio, under the circumstances, to criticize us for favoring this resolution, notwithstanding the language in our last national platform. It is simply another case of the pot calling the kettle black, a rôle which the gentleman always seems delighted to play. The other gentleman from Ohio, my Republican colleague, Mr. KEARNS, says that he does not think that he could give a good reason for voting against the resolution, and that he is going against his personal inclination, but that he feels bound by a declaration which he made before a notary public when he was a candidate and which binds him to vote that way. The trouble about my friend is that he made a mistake in thus obligating himself to vote against his judgment and conscience. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; I can not yield. My time is too short. If the law of Ohio compelled him to do that, as I infer to be the case, before he could come to Congress, then the fault is not his, but with the State of Ohio for passing such a foolish law. We do not pass such laws as that in Kentucky. [Laughter.]

I do not wish to be understood, however, as blaming the gentleman for standing by the wishes of his constituents on this or any other question, because, as I have frequently said on this floor, a Representative ought to represent the wishes of the people who sent him here or resign. My position on that point has been time and again confirmed since I have been a Member of this body by the vote on a number of measures that I recall. As a rule, Members representing a large foreign-born constituency have always voted against restrictive measures, and Members from wet districts usually vote wet, and vice versa. I am finding no fault with them for that, but I can not quite understand why it is that, as a rule, Members who are from wet districts are against this resolution, unless it be that they are afraid of the ballots of the women on that question. I do not say this as applicable to all, of course, but there seems to be a striking preponderance.

Gentlemen complain about this effort to force woman suffrage upon the States that do not want it, and about ignoring the wishes of that class of women in the country who do not ask for the ballot and do not desire it, and yet we are proceeding in the exact manner which the founders of the Republic themselves provided in the Constitution for its amendment, so that this argument is in effect a criticism of the only method of amendment to that instrument which was provided for us. What harm can it do the women who do not want to vote if we give the ballot to those who do want to vote? It might as well be contended that it is wrong to let some men vote because others never go to the polls. There has been a good deal of talk along these lines, but I have yet to hear a single sensible, logical reason why a democracy should deny to any patriotic citizen, with intelligence enough to vote and the desire to vote, the right to do so. Some gentlemen have contended that the founders of our Republic were against woman suffrage. I am not prepared to concede that this is a correct statement of their position, but even if it is, I firmly believe that if they were living to-day and had the privilege of voting on this resolution, they would vote for it in view of the changed conditions that now exist. Surely, if Woodrow Wilson can change his mind overnight and get by with it, Washington and Jefferson ought to be pardoned if they were to change their minds in a hundred years.

Judging from some of the arguments that have been presented here and elsewhere against this resolution, I suspect that some gentlemen have a conception of woman's sphere that is on a par with that expressed by a certain southern bachelor poet of more or less local fame, who in a spirit of poetic fervor exclaimed:

Woman, woman, thou art divine!
Oh, that I had one I might call mine,
To soothe me in my worstest woes
And cook my dinner and wash my clothes.

[Laughter.]

My distinguished friend and colleague [Mr. CANTRILL], whose political sagacity and wise foresight are everywhere recognized, has warned his Democratic associates from the Southland that if they vote against this resolution they are likely to lose their grip upon the legislative machinery of this body. That is, indeed, a consummation devoutly to be wished for. [Laughter.] If I may be permitted to digress enough to indulge in a political prophecy, I wish to say that, in my judgment, that consummation is already a foregone conclusion. [Applause on the Republican side.] But, however that may be, I am so anxious to see this resolution adopted that I hope you southern Democrats will follow my colleague's advice, and I for one am willing for my party to take its chances in the future upon other issues.

Much has been said pro and con about "picketing"—that rather dramatic chapter in the history of this great movement. It is not my purpose to speak either in criticism or commendation of that; but if it be true—I do not say that it is, because I do not know—but if it be true, as has been alleged, that certain promises were made, as a result of which a great campaign was won, and those promises were not kept, I wonder whether in that silent, peaceful protest that was against this broken faith there can be found sufficient warrant for the indignities which the so-called "pickets" suffered; and when in passing up and down the Avenue I frequently witnessed cultured, intellectual women arrested and dragged off to prison because of their method of giving publicity to what they believed to be the truth I will confess that the question sometimes arose in my mind whether when the impartial history of this great struggle has been written their names may not be placed upon the roll of martyrs to the cause to which they were consecrating their lives in the manner that they deemed most effective.

Mr. Speaker, ever since I entered the halls of the General Assembly of Kentucky, which was more years ago than I care to acknowledge here [laughter], and became the author of the first bill introduced in that body to give married women the right to hold a separate estate; indeed, ever since as a university law student, I studied the history and scope of the bondage in which the canons of the English common law held women, I have had an abiding faith that this measure of justice would, in the fullness of time, be meted out to the women of America. I earnestly hope and believe that, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, this will go down in history as the epochal day on which that was done.

Mr. Speaker, this is woman's era, and her plea for suffrage is as resistless as the tides of the sea. It required the problems developed by this war, and a practical demonstration of woman's usefulness in their solution, to prove that their enfranchisement is essential if governments instituted by men are to be perpetuated. And the errors and sufferings that have already occurred emphasize the expediency and justice of placing in the hands of the mothers of America the power of the ballot that they may have a real voice in shaping the course and destiny of the Republic, especially on questions like those with which we are now confronted, for who are more entitled than they are to have that voice? However much the balance of us may suffer as a result of war, it does not compare to what they suffer. Theirs is the unspeakable anguish, the unending sorrow. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the history of civilization shows that wherever the influence of true womanhood has touched the affairs of the world it has exalted them; that wherever that influence has been exerted, whether in spiritual or material affairs, it has lifted mankind to a higher plane of usefulness and honor. The world would be a barren waste without woman's ennobling influence and the wheels of progress will move faster, as they have already done, as the sphere of her activity is widened. Give all of them the ballot and we will have better laws, better government, better men, and a brighter and a better world. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this resolution proposes to submit to the States of the Union for ratification or rejection an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the privilege to vote.

It is erroneous to say that it is a proposal to submit the matter to the people of the different States and thus allow them to say whether they want the Constitution so amended, because the people will not be permitted to vote on the question at all. Under this proposed submission the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, without the people having a voice therein, can fasten this amendment on the Constitution and make it a part of the supreme law of the land. But in answer to this I apprehend the advocates of this measure will say that the people will vote on the question because they will elect the members of the legislatures which will ratify or reject the amendment. This is not the fact in all cases, Mr. Speaker. In some of the States legislators already elected, and elected without any reference to this question, will vote to ratify or reject this amendment if this Congress submits it in its present form. Take my own State, for instance: If this amendment is submitted this year, our legislature, which convenes in April of next year, will pass on the question of ratification, and men composing one-half of the senate in that legislature were elected in 1916 and without the slightest reference to this proposed amendment. Would this be giving the people of Florida an opportunity to express their views on this very important question? In view of this condition, which also exists in other States, advocates of this measure should not talk so flippantly of submitting the question "to the people."

But, Mr. Speaker, even if every member of every State legislature should be elected after this resolution should pass Congress, you would not get from the action of the legislatures a real expression of the people's will, because of the fact that so many issues, local and otherwise, enter into a campaign for the election of State legislatures that it would be impossible to state with certainty on what particular issue a member was elected. There is only one way provided by the Constitution to get with any certainty the will of the people relative to an amendment to that instrument, and that is to provide for conventions in the different States for the express purpose of passing on the proposed amendment. When the proper time arrives I propose to offer an amendment providing the convention method, so that delegates may be elected by the people, instructed either for or against ratification after full, free, and fair discussion of the same, and I sincerely trust I shall have the active support of the advocates of votes for women, who are so loud in their demands for fair play, and who are so long in professions of loyalty to the principle that the "people should rule."

Mr. Speaker, I want to talk a minute or two about the constitutional aspect of this proposition, and I know that when I mention that gentlemen are going to say, "Yes; you voted to submit the amendment on the prohibition question and you are estopped from raising that question here." But not so. They are different. There is no analogy between them, so far as the power of Congress is concerned. There is absolutely no analogy at all between them. The Constitution of the United States recognizes and leaves in the States themselves the right to fix the qualifications of voters, but the Constitution of the United States gives to the Congress the power to tax the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and if one legal principle in this country has been settled beyond all question it is the principle that the power to tax carries with it the power to destroy or to prohibit, if you please. Therefore the Congress had the right to submit an amendment to the States prohibiting the manufacture and sale of liquor because they had the right to destroy the manufacture and sale of it.

Our suffragette friends demand the ballot as a "right," and in all their literature and public addresses they refer to women as being "disfranchised." They are absolutely wrong in both of these propositions. Suffrage for either man or woman is not a "right" but is simply a privilege, to be conferred or withheld at the pleasure of the State. The Supreme Court of the United States, the highest judicial tribunal in all the world, has so repeatedly declared this principle that it does seem as though even the suffragettes would cease to designate suffrage as a "right." Neither are women disfranchised. To say that a person is "disfranchised" is to imply that they were once enfranchised and that the franchise has been taken from them. Women never were enfranchised, and therefore they are to-day as they always have been—simply unfranchised—and the question should be considered free from any idea that women have been deprived of something which they formerly possessed, and therefore that an injustice is to be righted. Several weighty considerations should enter into a determination of the pending proposition, but I shall not have the time to discuss them all, and shall, therefore, content myself by calling attention to a few which I regard as the most important.

My position is that the bestowal of the privilege of exercising the franchise will be extremely detrimental to both the country at large and to women as a class, and I believe I can convince any reasonable and unbiased person that I am right.

Both of these propositions may be considered together, because anything which is detrimental to the country is detrimental to women, and anything which is detrimental to women is detrimental to the country. If women are to take an active part in the politics of the country and in managing the Government, they must undoubtedly neglect some of the duties now imposed upon them by nature and by society. It occurs to me that this proposition is absolutely unassailable, for the simple reason that the multitudinous duties of such great importance now imposed upon the good women of the land constitute a burden entirely sufficient for them to carry. To add to the burden already placed on them would not only be an injustice, but would so increase their responsibilities as necessarily to result in the neglect of some of them, and thus the country would suffer loss. In order for a people to reach their highest development along all lines which make for the good of the whole, duties and responsibilities must be divided among the classes in such manner as to impose upon each class those duties and responsibilities for which it is best suited. In no other way can the highest degree of efficiency be reached, and "the greatest good to the greatest number" secured. Women as a class, while the intellectual equals of men, and frequently their superiors, are peculiarly fitted for those duties and responsibilities which pertain to the home and home life. Gentle, loving, tender, and true, it is their province to guide the children into paths which lead to the higher, better, and nobler life. Their duty to plant in the young mind the seeds of virtue, courage, and honor, and nurture them until they, with strength of character fully matured, are prepared to assume the burdens and responsibilities of life. Can there be in all the world a higher, nobler, more holy duty than that of guiding the thought, molding the character, and shaping the destiny of the youth of the land? There is no truer declaration than that "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the nation," and it is as true to-day as when first uttered. To confer on woman the right of suffrage is to lower her from her proud estate, and, as for me, I shall never consent that she shall be taken from the high pedestal which, since the dawn of civilization, she has so fittingly occupied with the common consent of all mankind.

I now desire to invite your attention for a few moments to a consideration of the question as to whether under our form of government the Congress, under the only power it has—the power delegated by the States—should undertake to submit an amendment of this character. I know that when I shall touch upon this subject I shall be met with the contention that those who supported the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution which provided for the prohibition of the liquor traffic in the States are estopped from opposing this resolution on the ground that it is an interference with the rights of the States. Mr. Speaker, I assert and believe I can convince the unbiased mind that there is absolutely no inconsistency in the two positions; I believe I can differentiate them so clearly that "the wayfaring man though he be a fool need not err therein."

The manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors are two acts which have always been under the ban of the law among civilized, enlightened people, as is evidenced by the fact that heavy licenses and other restrictions have always been attached to such manufacture and sale.

It has always been known and freely admitted that intoxicating liquors are detrimental both to the health and the morals of the people, and the regulation and suppression of the manufacture and sale of such articles comes squarely within the police powers of the Nation. The traffic in intoxicating liquors, either directly or indirectly, is responsible for a large portion of the crimes which fill our jails and penitentiaries, and is the largest contributor of inmates for our public almshouses. It is no interference with the domestic affairs of a State for the Nation to reach forth her strong arm to stem a flood of crime which threatens the very existence of the Government itself; it is no invasion of State rights for the Federal Government with its mightier power to step in the breach and protect the health of the people against the attack of a deadly disease; it is no usurpation of State jurisdiction for the central power to exert its authority in suppressing an evil which threatens to retard Christianity, destroy morality, and put in jeopardy the happiness, prosperity, and liberty of generations yet unborn.

The liquor traffic is an evil which threatens to undermine the manhood of America, wreck our institutions, and eventually destroy the Republic itself, and to argue that the national authority has no power to deal with a question of this character is to admit that the Federal Government is utterly impotent and powerless to protect itself. Dealing with a national peril such as is the traffic in intoxicating liquors is entirely different from and bears no analogy to the question of who shall constitute the electorate in the different States of the Union.

Article I, section 8, paragraph 1, of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

> The Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

In this clause two powers are conferred on the Congress, under either of which there is ample authority to warrant the prohibition of the liquor traffic in the States by the Federal Government without doing violence to the principle of State rights. Under the power to provide for the "general welfare of the United States" the Congress is amply justified in submitting an amendment proposing to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the several States of the Union. In view of the sorrow, misery, pain, poverty, and death which have followed in the wake of this traffic for so many years in every section of the Republic, where is the man who will seriously contend that its prohibition is not an effort to "provide for the general welfare of the United States"?

The other power contained in the paragraph of the Constitution which I have quoted, and under which I claim the Congress has ample authority to submit to the States an amendment to the Constitution providing for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, is the "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises," and so forth. No one, I presume, will have the hardihood to deny the constitutional power of Congress to "lay and collect taxes" on the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors at any place within the United States, although such place may be within the borders of a particular State. Such taxes on both the manufacture and sale have been levied and collected practically ever since the organization and establishment of the Government itself, and, so far as I am advised, the right so to do has never been seriously questioned.

If any legal principle is so firmly established in this country as to be absolutely beyond the pale of debate, it is the proposition that the right to tax carries with it the right to destroy, or to prohibit, if you please. This, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, is so clear that no room is left for argument. The States delegated to the United States the right to tax the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, and by that same grant of authority delegated the right to destroy or to prohibit such manufacture. The States delegated to the United States the right to tax the sale of intoxicating liquors, and by that same grant of authority delegated the right to destroy or to prohibit such sale. The Congress of the United States, under this delegated power, for very many years was content simply to tax the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, but finally decided that in the interest of the "general welfare" it was necessary to resort to the ultimate delegated power—the power to destroy—and submitted to the States what we know as the "prohibition amendment." Believing that I have demonstrated beyond question that the submission to the States of the "prohibition amendment" by Congress is not an invasion of the reserved rights of the States, I desire briefly to call attention to what I consider a most flagrant attempt to deprive the States of the Union of one of their most sacred and exclusive rights—the right to deal with the privilege of suffrage.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, suffrage is not a right which is inherent in any person, no matter of what race, color, sex, or station in life. It is a privilege conferred by the State, of which the person may be deprived at the will of the State. No person, therefore, has a natural right to vote, and can only exercise the privilege of voting after the State in legal manner has conferred that privilege. When the free and independent States on this continent, in order, as they said, "to form a more perfect Union," entered into the agreement to establish the United States of America, they, through their accredited representatives, agreed upon a Constitution which was afterwards ratified by the States and became effective, and to-day the compact of union between these States contains a full and complete statement of all the power given to the Government of the United States. The Federal Government is a government of delegated powers, and these powers were delegated to it by the several States, and it has power and authority from no other source. The Constitution provides specifically that "all powers not herein enumerated and hereby delegated to the United States are hereby reserved to the several States or to the people thereof," and therefore it is clear that the Federal Government can legally exercise no power unless the same is delegated to it by the Constitution in express language or by necessary implication.

If this proposition be sound—and I apprehend no one with any regard for his own reputation as a lawyer will dispute it—then let us examine the Constitution with reference to suffrage. Is the power to prescribe the qualifications of electors delegated to the United States in express language or by necessary implication? Is the authority to say who shall vote or who shall not vote in elections granted to the Federal Government either expressly or by inference? There is not one line in the Constitution which even hints at the grant of any such power to the Federal Government, but, on the contrary, the power to prescribe the qualifications of electors is reserved to the States exclusively. Article 1, section 2, paragraph 1, of the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

The seventeenth amendment of the Constitution, which relates to the election of United States Senators, contains exactly the same language with reference to electors in the various States. This language of the Constitution referring to the election of Representatives in Congress is the only place in that document where the qualifications of voters is even mentioned, and in this it will be seen that the framers of the instrument simply declared that "electors of Representatives in Congress should have the same qualifications as electors of the members of the most numerous branch of the legislatures of the respective States," leaving, of course, the power to define those qualifications exclusively to the different States, where that power had always been lodged.

It will also be noticed that in dealing with the election of United States Senators and presidential electors the whole matter was left where the makers of the Constitution found it, viz, within the jurisdiction and power of the States.

The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution do not in any wise conflict with my position. By those amendments Congress is not given the power to regulate the suffrage or to prescribe the qualifications of voters in the different States, but it is simply given the power to reduce the representation of a State if that State shall in the exercise of its exclusive power deny to a certain class the right to vote.

In effect the Constitution declares to each State that such State has the sole power to deal with the question of suffrage, and to declare who are qualified voters within its borders, and to exclude all from the polls who do not come within the prescribed class, but claims the right if a particular class of male citizens over 21 years of age are denied the right to vote "except for participation in rebellion, or other crime" to reduce the representation in Congress of each State "in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State." This amendment was adopted when partisan sectional feeling was at its highest tide in this country; and does anyone doubt that if the men who composed the Congress which submitted it had for one moment believed that they had the right they would not have submitted a resolution giving to Congress the absolute power to prescribe the qualifications of voters in the several States? I am convinced that if the right had even been doubtful in the minds of the statesmen of that day Congress would have been given full and complete power to deal with the whole question of suffrage in the States.

Mr. Speaker, not only is the right and power to prescribe the qualifications of electors expressly reserved to the several States of the Union, and therefore not delegated to the United States, but the several States have for more than a century and a quarter exercised this power, with the full knowledge, acquiescence, and I believe I am justified in saying with the distinct approval of the Federal Government. During all these years different qualifications for electors have existed in the different States, and the Government of the United States, knowing that the regulation of the suffrage was not within its powers, has never sought to interfere with the qualifications of the voters as prescribed in any of the States. The right to regulate the suffrage is the most important, the most sacred, the most vital of all the rights reserved to the individual States in the agreement for the Union of States, and I solemnly warn gentlemen that when they as the representatives of their people consent to give up this greatest of all the rights of a State they obliterate State lines and crucify local self-government. Gentlemen may attempt to satisfy or still their consciences with the reflection that, after all, it is simply a proposition to allow the people a chance to vote on the question; but, my friends, this is a proposal to reverse the order of nature, to repeal the law of God, to ruthlessly set aside the matured judgment of the "Fathers of the Republic," to ignore and trample underfoot the wisdom and experience of the ages, and to sacrifice upon the altar of an unnatural and inexplicable aspiration the priceless heritage of local self-government.

What of the stand of the two leading political parties on this question of conferring suffrage on women by constitutional amendment? Neither a Republican nor a Democrat in this House can square his vote for this resolution with the last utterance of his party. One or both of these parties in the future may declare for the pending proposition, but they not only have not yet so declared but, on the contrary, have, in effect, declared against it. The platform of the Republican Party in 1916 declared as follows on the subject of woman suffrage:

The Republican Party, reaffirming its faith in government of the people, by the people, for the people, as a measure of justice to one-half the adult people of the country, favors the extension of the suffrage to women, but recognizes the right of each State to settle this question for itself.

The platform of the Democratic Party in 1916 declared as follows on the subject of woman suffrage:

We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

Thus it is seen that neither of the two great political parties in its last official utterance declared for woman suffrage by amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In fact, to all intents and purposes, both parties declared against it, because they said, in effect, that the question of woman suffrage was a question for the several States to consider and determine, and therefore it follows that no Republican and no Democrat upon this floor can vote for this resolution and be absolutely loyal to his party platform. Your party platform says, in effect, that Congress has no jurisdiction to submit this resolution; that the subject matter is exclusively within the control of the States and should be determined by the people of the respective States. Can you claim to be a party man, loyal to your party platform, if you, while that platform declaration is still in force, by your vote say that Congress has jurisdiction to submit this resolution; that the subject matter is not exclusively within the control of the States and should not be determined by the people of the respective States?

Console yourselves, as you may, with all sorts of specious reasoning, the fact remains that a vote for this resolution is in direct conflict with the platform declarations of both the Republican and Democratic Parties. The only political parties which, in 1916, declared for woman suffrage by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States were the Socialist and Progressive Parties, and the passage of this resolution will be a victory for socialism in America. Democrats and Republicans on the floor of the American Congress, ignoring and deserting their own party declarations of faith and embracing, sustaining, and supporting one of the main planks in the platform of the Socialist Party is, indeed, something new in American policy, and demonstrates in the language of the Rev. Jasper that "the sun do move."

Neither Democrats nor Republicans can justify a vote for this resolution on the ground that it is a party principle or policy.

I was pained to notice in the press a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, what purported to be an interview with a prominent Southern Democrat, in which he was reported as warning Southern Democratic Congressmen that if they voted anything like solidly or in large numbers against this resolution they would be in grave danger of losing chairmanships of committees in this House; that the advocates of woman suffrage in the coming elections would defeat every Democratic candidate for Congress possible; and that this would give the next House to the Republicans. I sincerely trust this eminent gentleman, whom I esteem most highly, has been misquoted. He certainly could not have meant what the language attributed to him implies. If the language of that alleged interview means anything, it means that Democratic Members of Congress should sacrifice their views on a great constitutional question in order that they may continue to hold chairmanships of committees in this body. Mr. Speaker, when I became a Member of this body, I took an oath to "uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States."

That oath meant that I should "uphold and defend" it according to my best judgment, weak and feeble as it might be, and not according to the judgment and opinion of anyone else, no matter how strong and powerful that some one else might be, and so help me God. I intend to adhere to the spirit and the letter of that oath so long as I am a Member of this great body. No Member of this House can justify in the court of conscience abandonment of honest conviction because of political disaster to his own fortunes. No Member of this House can stand acquit of official perfidy, if he slaughters deliberate, conscientious opinion on the altar of party supremacy. It were better for our country, yea, ten thousand times better, that no Democrat should ever again hold a chairmanship of a committee in this House, than that one Democrat should resort to the ignoble expedient of bartering his own convictions on a great public question for the hope that his party may retain power. As a Democrat, I am anxious for my party to continue in control of this Government. Since we came into control of all the branches of the Government under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, the mightiest figure in all the world to-day, we have met successfully every condition, and demonstrated our capacity and fitness to properly manage the affairs of this great Republic; but, sir, as intensely anxious as I am to retain the reins of Government, I do not hesitate to say that I would rather see the Democratic Party deserve success than to see it succeed by abandoning the solid, stable rock of principle for the shifting sands of expediency. I have heard it said that the Republicans are going to vote for this resolution almost solidly, and that it would be good politics for the Democrats to line up solidly for it also, else the Republicans would get credit for its passage, if it should pass, and the Democrats would be swept from power in the next election. I do not believe it. I have found, during my 13 years of service in this House, that the average Republican Member is just about as loyal to his convictions as is the average Democratic Member, and about as unlikely to sell those convictions for "a mess of pottage." Even if I believed that every Republican upon this floor intended to repudiate the platform of his party on this question, I can not see wherein that would justify a Democrat in repudiating the solemn pronouncement of his own party, and I warn members of both organizations that no permanent good can come to any political party whose members will sacrifice an important principle of the organization for the hope of "a little brief authority." Such a course of conduct will surely earn for the political party which pursues it the lasting contempt of the great body of the American people.

It might be well, Mr. Speaker, in considering this question, to examine the views of some of those great thinkers of the world who have advocated woman suffrage, and who after more mature deliberation, or who, after observing its effect when put in operation, have changed their minds on the subject. John Bright in 1867 voted for woman suffrage, but after he had an opportunity to think and study the question more fully, as his final, deliberate judgment, said:

> I do not believe that women suffer by not being represented in Parliament, and I do not believe it would be an advantage to them if they were so represented.

Herbert Spencer was at one time a strong advocate of woman suffrage, but on fuller investigation renounced that position, stating that he had formerly argued the matter "from the point of view of a general principle of individual rights," but, he said, he found that this could not be sustained, as he "discovers mental and emotional differences between the sexes which disqualify women for the burdens of government and the exercise of its functions."

The Revolutionary fathers of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the convention at Newburyport, in 1778, discussed the whole question of suffrage with reference to women and declined to confer the franchise upon them, saying:

> Women, whatever age they are of, are also [not to have the suffrage] as not having a sufficiently acquired discretion—but not from a deficiency in their mental powers—but from the natural tenderness and delicacy of their minds, their retired modes of life, and various domestic duties. These concurring, prevents that promiscuous intercourse with the world which is necessary to qualify them for electors.

Bishop John H. Vincent, the founder of Chautauqua, and strong advocate of higher education of women, once favored suffrage for women, but, like most of the stronger thinkers, upon thorough study and full investigation of the question in all its bearings, came to the conclusion that he was wrong, and thus gave expression to his changed views:

> When about 30 years of age I accepted for a time the doctrine of woman suffrage and publicly defended it. Years of wide and careful observation have convinced me that the demand for woman suffrage in America is without foundation in equity, and, if successful, must prove harmful to American society.
> I find some worthy women defending it, but the majority of our best women, especially our most intelligent, domestic, and godly mothers neither ask for nor desire it. The instinct of motherhood is against it. The basal conviction of our best manhood is against it. The movement is at root a protest against the representative relations and functions by virtue of which each sex depends upon and is exalted by the other. This theory and policy tending to the subversion of the natural and divine order, must make man less a man, and woman less a woman.
> A distinguished woman advocate of this suffrage movement says: "We need the ballot to protect us against men." When one sex is thus compelled to protect itself against the other the foundations of society are already crumbling. Woman now makes man what he is. She controls him as a babe, boy, manly son, brother, lover, husband, father. Her influence is enormous. If she use it wisely she needs no additional power. If she abuse her opportunity she deserves no additional responsibility. Her womanly weight, now without measure, will be limited to the value of a single ballot, and her control over from two to five additional votes forfeited.
> The curse of America to-day is in the dominated partisan vote—the vote of ignorance and superstition. Shall we help matters by doubling this dangerous mass? Free from the direct complications and passions of the political arena, the best women may exert a conservative and moral influence over men as voters. Force her into the same mad atmosphere, and both man and woman must inevitably suffer incalculable loss. We know what woman can be in the "commune," in "riots," and on the "rostrum."
> Woman can, through the votes of men, have every right to which she is entitled. All she has man has gladly given her. It is his glory to represent her. To rob him of this right is to weaken both. He and she are just now in danger through his mistaken courtesy.

These are the testimonials of men who have made up their judgments not only after diligent study of the whole question in all of its bearings but men who originally were favorable to woman suffrage, and who were forced to change their views by the force of unanswerable logic. They are men who have earned their high places in the world of thinkers and students, and whose opinions are entitled to great respect. I commend their words to those among us who seemingly, with only a superficial examination, would plunge our beloved country into the maelstrom of interminable trouble, which must inevitably be produced by the engrafting of this amendment on the Constitution of the United States.

To-day woman stands the uncrowned queen in the hearts of all right-thinking American men; to her as rightful sovereign we render the homage of protection, respect, and love, and may the guiding hand of an all-wise Providence stretch forth in this hour of peril to save her from a change of relation which must bring in its train discontent, sorrow, and pain.

But we are told that this resolution should be passed as a "war measure," but just why it should be denominated as a war measure I have been utterly unable to understand. How could this legislation possibly aid us in the war in which we are now engaged? Do these good women, if given the privilege to vote, intend to shoulder arms and go to the front? I have heard of no such declaration of that intention on their part. If I knew that was their purpose, then I should oppose it more strenuously, if that were possible, because I am old-fashioned enough to believe that men, and men only, should fight the battles of their country. Women take up arms only after the men have become yelping coyotes and skulking cowards, and, I thank God, America has not as yet become Russianized. In what way then can woman suffrage help us win the war? If it could help us at all we could not avail ourselves of the assistance, because the war will undoubtedly have ended long before the proposed amendment could possibly become a part of the Constitution, and thus this claim of its proponents vanishes into thin air.

But, Mr. Speaker, the passage of this resolution will affect the war situation, but not in the helpful way claimed for it by its supporters. The President has said in effect that to win this war we must think together, speak together, and act together. In other words, that the American people must be harmonious and act as a unit if we are to be successful in this great world-wide conflict, and in the face of that statement of our great President it is seriously proposed to pass this resolution and start a riot of dissension, turmoil, and strife in every one of the 48 States of the American Union. Can you imagine any one thing which would be more productive of ill feeling and bitterness than to launch a campaign in every one of the 48 States of the Union to determine if woman suffrage should become a part of and guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States? Political parties and candidates for public office would be stirred up over the prospect of these millions of new voters being added to the registration lists, particularly with reference to their party alignment, and instead of presenting to our enemies an unbroken and harmonious front this great Republic in the very midst of the most terrible and devastating war of all time will exhibit to the world such a spectacle of domestic disorder and internecine strife as will inevitably dishearten our allies, strengthen the hopes and courage of our enemies, and weaken us in the opinion of all the world. If such a contest should ever be desirable, surely it is not desirable at a time like this, when we are engaged in a death struggle with the mighty forces of autocracy, on the issue of which depends the very life of democracy among men. The "picketing" of the White House and of Congress has given us some little idea of the methods which may be expected if this question is submitted to the legislatures of the different States for ratification or rejection. Pass this resolution, and not only will the Nation in time of war be plunged into turmoil, disorder, and bitterness by heated political meetings and inflamatory articles in the press, but the legislature of every State in the Union will be "picketed," governors will be besieged and harassed, legislators will be cajoled and threatened, and thousands of homes throughout the land where contentment now reigns supreme will be converted into a perfect bedlam of unseemly debate and bitter political disputation. It will not do to say that these things will not occur.

They have occurred in England, and in our own country right in our midst, and in practically every other country where the question has been raised. Mr. Speaker, the three things which will raise more disturbance, create more discord, separate more families, and raise more Cain generally than any other things on this earth is a county-site election, a church dispute, and a woman-suffrage campaign.

In the hearings before the committee it will be found that one of the leaders among the suffragettes declared that they wanted the ballot for "protection," and when asked against whom she desired "protection" she promptly and frankly replied "men." My God, has it come to pass in America that the women of the land need to be protected from the men? I do not live in a State where such a condition exists, and I am profoundly thankful for it.

If women desire and are to have the ballot to protect themselves from men and man-made laws, if they are to be placed upon an exact equality with men in administering the affairs of government, so that they may in future protect themselves, then they may expect no special protection of the law beyond what is accorded to men, and they should ask for the repeal of those laws which apply to them now by reason of being under the coverture of marriage.

No more when charged with crime can she be heard to plead coercion on the part of the husband; no more when marital troubles come can she go into the courts of the country and so easily secure the payment of her counsel's fees in divorce proceedings, alimony for herself pending the litigation, and permanent alimony in the final decree for the support of herself and children. In other words, she can not exercise the rights of a man and at the same time claim the privileges of a woman. The two are entirely incompatible, and she must relinquish the one or the other. If she relinquishes the privileges of a woman and secures the rights of a man, then, in my judgment, we shall soon see woman becoming more manly and man becoming more womanly. God forbid. It is said that "nature abhors a vacuum," and I want to say that about the nearest approach to a vacuum that I know anything about is a manly woman or a womanly man.

I come to the platform again. I was amused at my friend from Oklahoma, Mr. FERRIS, who wants us to stand with the President. God knows I want to stand with him. I am a Democrat, and I want to follow the leader of my party, and I am a pretty good lightning-change artist myself sometimes [laughter]; but God knows I can not keep up with this performance. [Laughter.] Why, the President wrote a book away back yonder. He said this:

> The suffrage in particular is a privilege which each State may grant upon terms of its own choosing, provided only that those terms be not inconsistent with a republican form of government.

He said again:

> All the powers of the General Government are plainly such as affect interests which it would be impossible to regulate harmoniously by any scheme of separate State action, and only such; all other powers whatever remain with the States. With them rests the regulation of the suffrage.

That is what the President said. Again he said:

> Federal law does not determine who shall vote for Members of the House of Representatives. The Constitution provides simply that all those persons in each State who are qualified under the Constitution and laws of the State to vote for Members of the larger of the two houses of the State legislature may vote also for Members of the House of Representatives of the United States. The franchise is regulated therefore entirely by State law.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I have not the time.

Now that is not all that the President has said.

Mr. SLOAN. Does not the statute of limitations intervene?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In a letter or in an interview with the New York Times on October 7, 1915, the President, referring to woman suffrage said:

> I believe that it should be settled by the States and not by the National Government.

He never rose to a higher plane of statesmanship than when he uttered that sentence. Again, on October 7, 1916, the President expressed himself in a letter to the Jane Jefferson Club, of Denver, Colo.:

> Both the great political parties have in their recent platforms favored the extension of suffrage to women through State action.

Not only that, but my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] construes the Democratic platform to mean that we should pass this resolution. I want to say that your leader and mine did not so construe it. I want to tell you that Mrs. Catt, the leader of the suffragettes, denounced the President after the Democratic convention for "playing fast and loose" on this question, and Mrs. Catt also delivered the utterance that some people may claim that that plank in the Democratic platform was in favor of a Federal amendment, but she did not believe anything of the sort; and she was right.

Ah, gentlemen, you can not get around it. Both political parties in their last official utterance have put themselves on record, and that is the law of the Democratic Party and that is the law of the Republican Party to-day. No President has a right to repeal the law of his party. No leader of any party has a right to do that; and both of those parties declared emphatically for woman suffrage, it is true, but through the regular legal channels of State action. That is where they both planted themselves.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I can not yield. No specious reasoning can avoid that. It is reported in the Washington Post this morning about that meeting that these gentlemen had down at the White House—I do not vouch for its truth—that the President said something else:

> Members of Congress who participated in the conference said the President told them he still believed that the proper and orderly way of dealing with the question was to permit each State to take its own action.

Did he say that? If he did, it is in keeping with what he has said heretofore. And I want to say something else. This paper also quotes my friend from California——

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. For just a second.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman from California say whether the President said that or not? Let us have it straight.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have not time to yield for that. He can answer that in his own time. I do not want it taken out of my time. But I want to say something else. You gentlemen can answer that. This paper says that—

> Representative RAKER, chairman of the Suffrage Committee, jubilantly predicted last night that the necessary two-thirds would be exceeded by 15 or 20 votes—

Counting on the weight of the President's influence to swing doubtful Democrats.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. And the headlines in the morning papers.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. To swing doubtful Democrats! Is there a man upon this floor worth his salt, or to be considered for a moment in connection with the high office of a Representative, who will change his convictions on a constitutional question because the President seems willing to change his position? I do not believe there is such a man, nor do I believe that our great President would have respect for one who did. The President has a right to change his views on this or any other question, and I claim the right as a Representative on this floor to stand by my own convictions and change my views only when convinced of error in the forum of my own judgment. In a matter of party policy I might be willing to waive my own views to coincide with the superior wisdom of my great leader, but not in a matter involving a constitutional question, which I am to determine for myself under my oath of office.

I want to say, in conclusion, that if I had no other objection to woman suffrage, I should oppose it because, in my humble judgment, the conferring of the franchise on woman will tend to disrupt the family, which is the unit of society, and when you disrupt the family you destroy the home, which in America is the foundation stone of the Republic. Nothing can convince me that a thing which is not only liable, but almost certain, to create discord in the families of men can ever prove beneficial to this country. If this resolution should pass and the proposed amendment should be ratified by three-fourths of the States of the Union, then we would find a condition where the wife would either blindly follow the husband in the casting of her vote or she would disagree with his views and have her vote counted in opposition to his. If the former is to be the case, then it occurs to me that all will agree that this would be an entirely superfluous and useless piece of legislation, as the only result would be to practically double the number of votes cast without changing in the slightest the political complexion of the State or the Nation, but adding largely to the expense of holding our elections. If the latter should be the case, then we would find the husband and wife constantly engaged in political disputation, which would grow warmer, more heated, and more acrimonious as the campaign advanced, until finally a veritable conflagration of domestic infelicity would be kindled, consuming the marital tie, destroying the home, and sending the children, to all intents and purposes, orphans out on the cold charity of the world to become charges on the State. It may be said that this picture is overdrawn, but, sir, it is not. Man and wife to live happily together must be in harmony. They must think alike, act alike, have the same ideals of life, and look forward with like vision to the happy consummation "beyond the vale." Anything which will disturb this harmony will tend to disrupt the union, and there is nothing known among men so disturbing in its character and so productive of dissension, ill temper, and bitterness of feeling as is partisan political discussion unless it be factional political discussion.

God knows that factional politics, when confined to two wings of the same political party, is bad enough, but when you get factional politics limited to husband and wife, oh, what a spectacle will be presented, my countrymen. Disagreement will supplant concord; discord will take the place of harmony; home will be neglected for the political rostrum; household duties will be left unperformed while political rallies are attended; children will be left without the guiding hand of mother while she goes valiantly forth to save the Nation; respect of wife for husband will give way for contempt, and love will vanish while hate ascends the throne.

But, say some, "You are speaking only of the women who are married; what of those who are not married?" Mr. Speaker, I am speaking of those who are married, and I think this question ought to be settled with relation to its effect upon the married women of the land, because that is the relation which nature intended for them. The unmarried woman who has passed marriageable age is the exception to her class, and no general law should ever be passed to fit the exceptions to the class upon which it is intended to operate. I am quite sure this is a principle of legislation so sound and so universally accepted that no one will be found to question it. The Creator of us all intended that men and women should mate—one woman for one man is the law of God, and the law of all enlightened Christian people everywhere. It is not only in accord with the law of nature for men and women to marry, but it is also in accord with that law for them to establish homes and rear children. I dare say there is not a girl throughout this broad land who does not expect at some time in the future to marry, have a home, rear children, and be supremely happy in her own little world. Why, then, should we make a general law to fit the case or suit the convenience or cater to the whim of a few exceptions to the general class of women? I confidently believe that a great majority of the women of America do not want the burden of suffrage placed upon them.

If they do, why is it that the suffragists never make a proposition to leave the question to a vote of the women of the State or the Nation? If this were done in a primary or by some other method, and the suffragists came here with proof that a majority of the women of the country really desired to assume this burden, they would at least be in position to speak with authority as representing their sex. But, Mr. Speaker, before I will believe that the American woman, contented and happy in the love of her husband and children, desires to exchange her proud estate for the poor privilege of dragging her skirts through the mud and mire of partisan politics I must have indisputable proof. I know that it is quite out of fashion in some circles to speak of man's protection of woman and her dependence upon him. I know that in some quarters there has grown up out of the progressive civilization of our time a tendency to ridicule and sneer at every reference to the finer and more tender emotions of humanity, and this tendency to ridicule reached its climax when a suffragette leader some time ago sneeringly referred to the Association of Women Opposed to Woman Suffrage as "the Home, Mother, and Heaven Party." I thank God for "the Home, Mother, and Heaven Party." If she had only added one more word and made it the "Home, Mother, Wife, and Heaven Party" it would have been complete, and she would have linked together the four sweetest words in all the language. These four—home, mother, wife, and heaven—are the corner stones of our governmental structure, and if either be destroyed, the Republic will crumble to decay and self-government among men will pass from the earth. Ridicule it, if you please; sneer at it, if you will; but I shall never cease to reverence and love the sweet, womanly wife and mother who, in the fear of God and with queenly dignity, presides over an American home. Hers is the proudest place in the economy of the universe. Talk about rights, about influence, about power—all mankind is at her feet, and she wields a scepter more powerful than that of any king or potentate, the scepter of wifely fidelity and motherly love. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], a member of the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if every Member of this House could have heard the splendid speeches of Mrs. Maud Woods Park, of Massachusetts, and Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, of New York, and of the other splendid women who appeared before our committee, there would be nothing left to say on the adoption of this amendment. I have racked my brain to discover some new point or idea on this question, but, so very ingenious and comprehensive were their arguments, I must, indeed, be careful if I avoid repetition. I take it that every Member in this House may be classified into one of two groups, and two only; first, those who are in favor of women voting, and, second, those who are against women voting. You can make all the excuses imaginable, and attempt to satisfy your consciences with this or that reason for denying to woman a God-given right inherent with citizenship, to enjoy equally with men the privilege of voting; and you can say what you please about dodging this question behind the proposition of State rights, but, after all, when the excuses and reasons are stripped down there is nothing left but a blunt unwillingness to let women vote.

When my southern colleague says that he is against it because of State rights, when you pin him down to the crucial question you will find out that he is unwilling for women to have the vote at all, even though acquired through the State method, and that generally and every other way he is against the proposition of women voting in this country. The first group that I have mentioned are willing to admit women are a part and parcel of the people of this Nation, and that when the Constitution of the United States says "the people of the United States" that term embraces women as well as men. The second group believe that the Constitution of the United States was ordained and established for "men only," and, with teeth clenched and eyes shut, are still manfully asserting that such expression "the people of the United States" is of the masculine gender and applies and relates only to him who each evening hangs his hat in the hall after he enters the front door of his castle.

So far as State rights are concerned, if this amendment sought to take away from any State the right of fixing the qualifications of its voters, I would be against it first, last, and all the time, but such it does not. With the exception of the question of sex, it does not affect one single qualification that any State has now or may desire to impose, and all such qualifications will remain the same as now until changed by State action. No State, however, should prescribe a qualification which it would be absolutely impossible for an honorable, intelligent, high-minded, and high-principled citizen ever to acquire. Why, so far as this bugaboo negro question is concerned, your Constitution has already fixed the right of negro women in this country. Show me a State to-day that has suffrage in its constitution and I will show you a State which now can not regulate the question entirely, for it could not let white women vote without also enfranchising the negro women. Let the legislature of that State attempt to-day to restrict the vote to white women, and what would happen? Why, it would be unlawful under the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution. You could not do it, because the Supreme Court would hold that if you attempted to give the suffrage to the white women of this country, under the terms of the fifteenth amendment, you must likewise give it to negro women. Hence, so far as the color question is concerned, the Constitution has already fixed that, and what we seek now, merely, is to fix the sex question, a matter for which God alone is responsible, and over which the particular individual, unfortunately born a female, has no control. After this amendment has been proposed by Congress and ratified by the States and becomes the constitutional law of the land, States will still prescribe all qualifications—age, residence, registering, procuring poll-tax receipts, reading and writing, and so forth.

My friends, I want to say to my Texas colleagues that my district has already spoken in no uncertain terms on this question.

It is my honor to represent the biggest district in the United States, a district that embraces 58 counties, some of them about 100 miles across, north and south, such as Pecos, Reeves, El Paso, Brewster, and Presidio, and which district, east and west, is 556 miles, a distance over twice as far as from this Capitol to New York. In that district there is a greater territory than in six of the smaller States. In that district there are 400,000 people.

In the last campaign I ran against a man who had been an honored Member of this body for 14 years. In my platform I made an issue upon national woman suffrage in favor of it, and he was against it. I had joint debates with him in that district. My district elected me by an overwhelming majority, and thus spoke for national woman suffrage. [Applause.] If my friends from Texas believe that the Texas people are not in favor of this question, let them just try it once and fail to put the issue in their platform, and let their opponents espouse it and make it an issue in their districts, and you will see how they will act. I shudder to think of the consequences, for the Democrats of Texas have not forgotten what democracy and our Government owes to the western suffrage States and to the good women of the West, and particularly to the loyal mothers in America. I take it that so far as my territory is concerned, which in area embraces nearly one-fourth of the whole State, the Texas people have already spoken.

I am not surprised at my friends on the Republican side of the House who criticize the President of the United States. They are on the outside looking in, and he is on the inside looking out; but I am surprised that a Democrat from Florida should make the kind of an argument that he has made upon the floor of this House, when to-day he enjoys his standing in the organization of this Congress and his chairmanship of the committee by reason of the fact that the President won a reelection because he was willing at all times to derive his power from the people he governed and to do justice to all and at all times, and hence gained a Democratic victory in the last campaign. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Had I the time I would, gladly. I wish I had the time so that every benighted Member of this body opposing this resolution could ask me a question, as it would be a pleasure for me to enlighten him; but my time is limited and I can not yield.

My friend from Florida did ont emphasize that particular part of the article which the President wrote in his book when he said it should be left to the States to fix the terms; he said also that they should fix those terms so long as they were not against a republican form of government. If you deny the 14,000,000 white women of this country the right to vote, you are interfering with a republican form of government. [Applause.]

When the President of the United States says, "I get my power, not from God above, like an autocratic German Kaiser, but I get my power from the people of the United States, the people whom I govern," is it anything strange that a President who represents a Republic like that should say that it would be unjust to deny to the women of this country the right to express their voice in the affairs of their Government? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the United States of America is a party to the great war not only to save the world for democracy but to protect its own homes and firesides from the wolves of Prussia. We abhor the German philosophy that might makes right; but, on the other hand, we know that right without might means the triumph of wrong. The future of our Nation and of civilization itself is at stake. We have become the deciding factor in the situation. If we win the war or do our part in winning the war, it will be by the exercise of physical force; and that physical force is vested in the manhood of the Nation. A nation is just so strong as its men are strong. A nation will endure just so long as its men are virile. History, physiology, and psychology all show that giving woman equal political rights with man makes ultimately for the deterioration of manhood. It is therefore not only because I want our country to win this war but because I want our Nation to possess the male virility necessary to guarantee its future existence that I am opposed to the pending amendment.

Our country entered into this war by the votes of the male Members of Congress. If we win the war or do our part in winning the war, it will be done primarily by the physical force of the male men of the Nation. The majority of the women of the Nation may be for war or they may not be for war. We can not afford to take the chance that they are not for war and give them the vote. We are determined to win this war, no matter what it may cost us in men and in treasure, and we should not stand for the introduction of any uncertain domestic element into the proposition. That high priest of pacifism, William Jennings Bryan, said that woman should have the vote, and that then the question of war should be submitted to a national referendum. That sole female representative of woman suffrage in the House, Miss JEANNETTE RANKIN, admitted, not from judgment but from her woman's heart, that while she loved her country, she could not vote for war. This war may last a year or it may last 10 years. At all events, it is not impossible that it will last long enough to see this proposed amendment adopted by three-fourths of the States and made part of the organic law of the land. With the war still on, how would you like to see a majority of the membership of Congress made up of women? And that in the face of the fact that this is a war to the death, a war of extermination, a war of annihilation, a war to be fought to the finish by strong men, courageous men, red-blooded men, virile men, men who can watch their life-blood flow without whimpering. This is no issue to be decided by woman's fears and tears and emotions; this is an issue to be decided by the real, manly men of America. And that is another reason why I am opposed to the pending amendment.

The advocates of woman suffrage point to the heroic part the women of France and England have played in the war and the splendid part the women of America are playing in the war as a reason why woman should be given the vote. Do they mean to suggest that if the women of America are not given the vote, they will be less loyal to the cause? Do they mean to insinuate that the womanhood of America is so base as that? Why, real womanhood has always stood behind real manhood. Woman has, from the very institution of family life, been man's second-line of defense. I have said that the United States was in this war not only to save the world for democracy but to protect its own homes and firesides. The two objects are one; they go together. And the women of America, in gladly sending their men forth to fight for democracy, know that their men are fighting for their women as well; fighting to save them from the barbaric savageries of German soldiers; fighting to keep the United States of America a safe place for them and their children and their children's children to live in for all time to come. Are the great mass of the loyal women of America who have sent and are sending their husbands and brothers and sweethearts forth to battle caring whether they, the women, shall be given the vote or not? Not—if you are honest in your observation—not so that you could notice it.

It must follow, as a logical sequence of the German philosophy that might makes right, that war and not peace is the normal condition of society. We, however, to whom the German philosophy is abhorrent, take the view that war is an inversion of the normal condition, that it is disorder, insanity, chaos, or, as Gen. Sherman expressed it, it "is hell." If our women find it necessary to work in the munition factories and to plow the fields, as the women in France and England have been obliged to do, it will not be because they prefer to do that kind of work, but because they are willing to do it to back up their men at the battle front. If our women find it necessary to do this kind of work, it will not be because their men elect it, but because their men are willing to yield to the exigencies of the situation, much as the idea is revolting to them. Therefore, again it must follow as a logical sequence that if in this abnormal condition brought on by war, if, in the inverted state of things in which society finds itself by reason of war, woman should be given the vote because of the part she is taking in war, then, by the same token, when conditions go back to the normal and peace once more hovers over the land, the vote should be taken away from her.

Suppose the United States should be engaged in this war as long as England and France and Germany already have been, and had lost as many men as they have lost, what do you suppose the principal industry in the United States would be after the war was over? I will tell you. It would be the having and the rearing of children. And that would be woman's mission, the maternalistic inclinations of many modern men to the contrary notwithstanding. And if, after the war is over, the economic condition of woman shall so nearly equal that of man that she shall be entitled to the vote, if for every man working in the factory and the field there shall be a woman so engaged, then, I want to tell you, your social structure will have gone to smash, and your family, as the unit of society, will have gone to smash. If, after the war is over, woman is not free to have children, to establish and reestablish and maintain the home, without any thought of political equality with man, but with a firm reliance upon man as her God-given protector and champion, then you will have to confess that your civilization is a failure and that God and nature both have erred in their scheme of things. And that is another reason why I am opposed to the pending amendment.

I have used the war argument against woman suffrage because I deem it to be the most immediate and convincing at this time. But I am opposed to woman suffrage on a more fundamental basis, and it is this: That "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created He him; male and female created He them. And God blessed them; and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it." Male and female created He them; and while they so remain they will not only be fruitful and replenish the earth, but they will subdue it. But when the sexes coalesce, when the masculine becomes effeminized and the feminine becomes masculinized, they will do neither. And the inevitable, the ultimate result of giving woman equal political rights with man will be the coalescing, the deterioration of the sexes. Even now we have a powerful element in the woman suffrage movement represented by the feminists who demand that if they submit to the inconvenience of having children the State shall support those children. Even now it is a sorry commentary on the male sex, a sorry augury for the future, that they are willing to yield up their natural dominion as men to the unnatural dominion of women. I am not thinking of the immediate effect of the enactment of woman suffrage; it will be merely to complicate and make more expensive our elections. I am not thinking of political expediency, for my actions and utterances here to-day may spell my political finish. But I am thinking of the future of society and the race. You men who are going to vote for the amendment may lay the flattering unction to your souls that you are getting away with something that will mean your reelection. Well, have your reelection. But allow me to predict that when you are dead and gone, and your political achievements have long since been forgotten, the historians of the future will describe this day, if you pass this amendment, as the day that marked the beginning of the decay of the great American Republic. And it is because I think more of the future of the country than I do of my own future that I am opposed to this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I notice on the front page of one of the leading dailies of this country a large headline which reads as follows: "Freedom of the world is U. S. aim." Similar headlines have appeared on the front pages of the press throughout this country the past two days. Of course, they refer to the President's historical speech, in which he outlines the aims of America and the allies in this world war. The President has several times, and again on yesterday, stated what every thoughtful American begins to realize, that hereafter America must and will assume not only an important but a leading place in all the international affairs of the world. Never again in our history will our country pursue the policy of exclusion, or refrain as we have heretofore, from interfering, if necessary, with the international affairs of the world. If "the freedom of the world" is the aim of our country, if we are to be leaders in liberalizing the human race, if that is to be the policy and the aim of every loyal American, I can not conceive of how any patriotic citizen, who loves his country and respects the rights of common humanity, can vote against a proposition intended simply to accord those rights to the good women of our country. There never was a time in the history of the world when the women, not only of this country, but of every other country, have demonstrated so overwhelmingly their right to this recognition as at the present time. In fact to deny them the right, especially in America, of a participation in the affairs of our country at this time would be a most colossal act of injustice. The eyes of the whole civilized world are centered on our action here to-day. This vote is one of the most important and far-reaching that has ever been, or ever will be, cast in this House, and I can not believe that in view of the hopes and prayers of the women of the world, and the eloquent and forcible appeal of the President of the United States to pass this amendment, "As an act of right and justice to the women of the country and of the world," that one-third of this great body will vote against it. This is not a local or even a national matter. This is an international and a world-wide proposition. It affects all of the other nations as well as our own, and as much, if not more, than any act of Congress during this war. It is the test of our good faith and of our preaching of liberty and justice to all humanity. Within the next three years the women of the entire British Empire; in fact, of all the English-speaking people of the world, outside of the United States, will be granted the right of suffrage, and it would be a colossal blunder as well as an unspeakable outrage if the United States shall fall behind the rest of the civilized world in granting this plain and simple act of justice to our good women.

I have been an advocate of woman suffrage for over 30 years. Colorado was the second State in the Union to adopt woman suffrage. The women of my State have been voting now for nearly 25 years. Our women are entitled to the lion's share of the credit for redeeming the State of Colorado from being one of the most "wild and woolly" of the West to one of the most orderly and best-governed States in the Union. While I have not recently examined the statistics, I feel reasonably confident in saying that Colorado spends more money per capita on both her schools and her roads and has a smaller percentage of crime than any other State in this Union. If the question of woman suffrage were submitted to the voters in Colorado to-day, there is not 1 per cent of the voting population who would vote against it. During the nearly 25 years that women have been voting and holding office in Colorado there has never been a defalcation or any dishonest act committed by any of the over 10,000 women who have held public office in my State, and no record equal to that has ever been made by an equal number of men from the time the world began to this hour.

But, Mr. Speaker, time will not permit a discussion of this great subject. I can only say that I confidently believe this amendment will pass this House to-day. But whether it does or does not, a few men can not block the wheels of progress or prevent the evolution of the human race or the final triumph of justice and right, and those who oppose this measure to-day will see the triumph of it within the next two years, and they will have occasion to sorely regret its opposition at this time. The women of this country are going to be given this right for the reason, first, that it is absolutely just, and for the further reason that wherever women have been given this right throughout the civilized world they have wisely exercised it, and their influence has been unqualifiedly beneficial. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, woman suffrage in America is inevitable.

Political status flows out of and is supplemental to social and economic status. The belief prevalent in certain circles that the former is the means of achieving the latter is not based upon the experiences of the human race. The history of civilization teaches us that political equality can not permanently be withheld from a class or a division within a people which approximates social equality and economic independence; furthermore, attempts to bestow political equality upon such classes as are socially and economically dependent upon the rest of the population have universally failed. In the past the restriction of the right of suffrage to the male population was not contrary to democratic philosophy, because under the old order of civilization women derived their social status from their men and were economically dependent upon them.

For the past half century a change in this regard has been taking place in the social structure, particularly in the last generation. The old conception of the place of woman in the scheme of existence was that she was the member of a household, which was ruled by a male head; that her place in the world was determined by the place held by this head; and that he was responsible for her economically. Among many this conception still obtains as a theory, and is still to an extent recognized in the law, but in reality has been substantially modified. The mass of women in this country are no longer entirely and solely dependent upon the men for their support and maintenance. In a large majority of American households girls are prepared for and enter gainful occupations, just as the boys. On the farms their labor within the sphere allotted them contributes to the common support, just as that of the sons. In the marriage relation the wife is no longer under such domination of her husband as he might exercise over an older child. She retains control of her own property, and her liberty of action in ordinary affairs is unchallenged. The restrictions of old conventions that limited her social activities no longer obtain. These strides toward social and economic independence do not result from the demands of women for them, but flow from industrial conditions.

This status by women having been achieved, participation in political affairs is a necessary corollary. The opponents of woman suffrage are not in reality opposing the giving of the vote, but are protesting against and are trying to deny the existence of the present order of things that makes the granting of the vote logical and necessary. I deeply sympathize with those who regret the passing of the old ideal, wherein the activities of womankind are bounded entirely by the home, brightening the life of her husband, guarding and rearing her children, while she enjoys the love, support, and protection of her mate.

But in solving public questions we must square our actions with realities and not with fond delusions. Woman suffrage, then, is inevitable. Under normal conditions we might well allow it to become universal in the country after protracted struggles through a long period of years and by piecemeal,

Now we are at war. The entire energy of the Nation and its resources need be utilized to achieve the victory. For this reason I deem it wise that this controversy be ended as speedily as possible, and in the only way in which it sooner or later necessarily will be settled. Consequently I shall vote to submit this amendment to the States for ratification. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, a little more than 400 years ago Columbus discovered America. Before that page of American history was written he was compelled to seek the advice and assistance of a woman. From that day until the present day the noble women of America have done their part in times of peace and times of war to make this grand country what it is to-day. For that reason I am in favor of this resolution, and I am in favor of granting suffrage to the women all over America.

I believe that the time has come when the efforts of the noble women of this country are going to be crowned, and that they have arrived at the brow of the hill from which they can see Jerusalem and the temple walls. [Applause.]

I come from a State that, I am proud to say, whose delegation in Congress is practically unanimous on this proposition of woman suffrage. It is a divided State politically, but I desire to state in justice to the Members of Congress from that State that I believe the opinions of none of them have been changed by the miraculous conversion of the President to this cause. I have no criticism of the President coming out for woman suffrage. I am glad that he is standing with me on that proposition, and I hope that his conversion will be like that of St. Paul, and that he will become a master worker in the vineyards of the Lord for this proposition. [Applause.]

I can say but little in the two or three minutes allotted to me on a question like this. It has been suggested that 38 or 39 men who made the Constitution of the United States possessed all the wisdom of the earth. I will grant that these men were noble, that they were wise, but you must remember that at the time these men made the Constitution none of them had ever seen a cook stove, none had seen a telephone, a telegraph, an automobile, or any of the modern things which we have in this day. They were all right in legislation and in the making of constitutions for their time, but we are living in a progressive age, and, while the politicians may stand still, very often these great questions get beyond them, which this seems to have done. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. President, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SMALL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RANDALL). The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I shall not attempt to discuss the merits of woman suffrage, although it is obviously a debatable proposition. There are sharp differences of opinion entertained by intelligent citizens throughout the country, and even in those States which have granted suffrage to women it is still an experiment in government.

Even if one were in favor of equal suffrage, he should be opposed to securing it by the method of constitutional amendment. My objections to the method are fundamental. This amendment is to prohibit the States from denying to women the right to vote. In its results it commands the States to grant the franchise to women. Under our scheme of government this is an unwarranted and dangerous invasion of a fundamental right of the States. In our governmental structure there are two independent units of governmental power. The Federal Government has jurisdiction of all national and external affairs. The States have jurisdiction of all local and internal affairs. With the State rests exclusively the right of local self-government. Such of these rights as were left with the States by the framers of the Constitution, and which clearly and unreservedly are comprehended as matters of local self-government, can not be impaired without serious injury to our form of government.

The extension of the franchise and the regulation of the right of voting at elections was by the Constitution left with each State, and, except as modified by the fifteenth amendment, it still remains unchallenged within the jurisdiction of the States. It has been the opinion of those who formed this Government and of every reputable student of the Constitution that the right of the States to control elections should not be disturbed. This was clearly expressed by Jefferson and Hamilton. However much these constructive minds may have differed about the interpretation of the powers granted to the Federal Government, they both agreed as to the importance of maintaining unimpaired in the States all the essential rights of local government. This position has been ably affirmed by such distinguished writers on the Constitution as Judge Story, Judge Cooley, Mr. Pomeroy, and John Randolph Tucker.

We are therefore squarely confronted with the query whether, as the representatives of the people and the defenders of the Constitution, we shall depart from this settled and well-defined principle of government. I do not feel free to make that departure. My judgment and my civic conscience constrain me to stand by the form of government under which for more than a century we have maintained liberty, promoted civilization, and become the acknowledged premier among all the republics of the world.

Under Article I, section 2, of the Constitution it is provided that the House of Representatives shall be chosen by the people of the several States, "and the electors of each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature." This means that the Members of this House are elected by those citizens whom each State has declared are entitled to vote for members of the most numerous branch of their State legislatures.

This provision was in the original Constitution and this interpretation has never been questioned. It was so satisfactory that when, within this decade, we adopted the seventeenth amendment providing for the election of Senators by the people of the several States it was provided in substantially identical language that Members of the Senate should be elected by voters having "the qualifications required for the most numerous branch of the State legislature." Subject to the provision in Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government," the States have continuously exercised the power to regulate the right of voting at elections. If it could be expressed with propriety, it might be said that those who seek to change this fundamental principle exhibit an ignorance and disregard of the history and structure of our Government.

It may be profitable to examine some of the reasons assigned in behalf of this amendment. It would be superfluous to refer to those noisy and sentimental men and women who declare that they favor equal suffrage and therefore favor this amendment. Their innocence of any knowledge of our Government would be ludicrous if the results were not so serious. They have a feeling that they are in favor of equal suffrage, and they follow the procession of that class of people who appeal to the Federal Government in behalf of every kind of reform.

The advocates of this amendment point to the action of Great Britain and other countries in extending the suffrage to women, and conclude that the United States should do likewise. They forget that what Great Britain may do is, under our form of government, denied to the United States, but rests with the several States. They might the more consistently contend that whereas 12 of the States of the Union have adopted suffrage that the remaining 36 States should likewise extend the suffrage to women.

These advocates further contend that by the constitutions of most of the States suffrage is denied to women, and they plead the length of time which would be consumed in inducing these States to amend their constitutions as an argument in favor of forbidding these States to deny women the right to vote. If this amendment can be submitted and ratified, it will unquestionably be the most expeditious method of overriding the will of the States and depriving them of an essential power; but such expeditious method would dangerously weaken the capacity of the States to manage their local affairs and would undoubtedly centralize power in the National Government. We are a confederated Union, which has grown to be a giant in power and influence, but that Union is composed of many States, and the Union has grown strong through the States. Any impairment of the independence or the rights of the States to manage their internal affairs will, by reflex action, weaken the strength of the Union.

The advocates of this amendment have attempted to inject this issue into the political parties. They have threatened to defeat for reelection members of the opposition, although such threats in the past have not materialized. They have attempted to secure the support of the Democratic and Republican Parties and induce rivalry between them by threats of reprisal against each.

This is no party question, and such efforts will be futile. It almost equals in intelligence the scheme of that delectable and inane group of women who picketed the White House on the theory that the President could grant them the right to vote. Some of these demonstrative advocates of suffrage are evidently imitating the tactics of another class of moralists and Constitution tinkerers of the Anti-Saloon League, who regard the Constitution as an elastic instrument which Members of Congress may seek to amend at the instance of any numerous body of citizens. They insist that if the people in large numbers wish to secure a reform and are unwilling to wait upon the States, that it is the duty of Members to submit such amendments. They say that any representative number of citizens have the right to demand the submission of an amendment in the nature of a referendum to the legislatures of the States, regardless of the nature of the amendment or whether it violates the fundamental principle of government.

If the confederated union was the unit of local government, and it was consistent with our political structure for the Federal Government to attempt to fix the qualifications of the franchise throughout the country, then it would be in order in this forum to argue the merits of equal suffrage and its adaptation to the country, but neither of these propositions are correct, and therefore the desirability of equal suffrage has no place in this discussion.

I have stated that with the exception of the fifteenth amendment the power of each State to regulate the right of voting at elections had never been challenged. That amendment prohibited any State from denying the right to vote to any citizen on account of race or color. I shall not attempt to question the motives of those who advocated that amendment. It was a direct aftermath of the great Civil War. But I will venture a brief and frank discussion of its merits. This amendment, followed by the efforts to enforce it, created the horrible era of reconstruction in the Southern States. There were racial conflicts. Industrial and educational progress was arrested. Not until Federal troops were withdrawn and the Southern States were left to work out their own local government were peace and sectional unity restored. As an academic and ethical proposition the fifteenth amendment could not be condemned, but it is a political fact that it violated a fundamental principle of local self-government. The people of every State are jealous of this right. It is no more peculiar to North Carolina or Louisiana than it is to Ohio or Massachusetts. To force equal suffrage upon an unwilling State will not be tantamount to the peaceful and undisputed enjoyment of this privilege. I ask Representatives if, in the face of the one experiment which we have made in interfering with the right of each State to control the exercise of the franchise, we should be willing to repeat that unhappy experiment? I submit the question not alone to Representatives of the South but to intelligent and conscientious students of government from every State in the Union.

The proposition substantially resolves itself into this question, Shall we maintain the dual form of government instituted by the fathers and embodied in the Constitution, which has been characterized as the greatest political handiwork of man? Shall we continue to limit the power of the Federal Government to purely external affairs and to the exercise of those powers which are essentially national? Shall we preserve in the States unrestricted jurisdiction over those subjects which are internal and which have always been recognized as inherently embraced among the rights of local self-government? If we intend to change our form of government, if we intend to centralize the administration of local affairs in the Federal Government, and if we intend to make the States mere subdivisions and dependencies of the Central Government, we may be justified in submitting this amendment, but not otherwise. My duty seems clear, and I shall vote against the submission of the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUFKIN].

Mr. LUFKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely opposed to the passage of this amendment at this time. I could offer many excuses for this opposition, but they would not appeal to me as good reasons. I could cite, for example, the fact that in a State-wide campaign in Massachusetts two years ago universal suffrage was defeated by over 133,000 votes, or I could cite as a more personal reason that in my own congressional district in that election universal suffrage was defeated by nearly 10,000 votes, or about two to one. Moreover, I am not opposed to the amendment because I believe that the women of this country are not intelligent enough to vote. A trial of the system in many of the States of the Union has proven the fallacy of this argument.

My opposition to the passage of this resolution is based solely and entirely on the fact that in my opinion this is no time to be trying an experiment of such tremendous magnitude as the granting of the franchise to millions and millions of new voters. These are decidedly abnormal times. The management of this great war is, to my mind, pretty much a one-man job, and, so far as I am concerned, until peace is finally declared, I should prefer to restrict the suffrage of the country rather than to increase it. This especially applies to the State of Massachusetts, which I have the honor in part to represent. Our State is so fortunate, or so unfortunate, according to one's viewpoint, as to have annual elections of all State and of a great many of the municipal officers. The result is that we have a State-wide primary every September, a State-wide election every November, municipal elections in the cities every December, and municipal elections in the towns in March. That seems to me to be quite enough politics for one community to undertake in one year, with war work and the horrors that go with it on all sides of us. Two years ago we had a State-wide campaign for woman suffrage in Massachusetts, lasting from early spring until November. I venture to say that there was not a street corner in any city or town of our great Commonwealth which was not entertained at least once a week during those eight months with orators on one side or the other of the suffrage cause. The campaign was conducted intelligently and energetically by both sides. It was perhaps interesting and educational at that time, but to-day the people's minds are on other questions. Our officials, both State and National, are striving with but one point in view, namely, to fight this war successfully and to bring it to the earliest possible end. With such conditions around us, I do not desire to see Massachusetts obliged to go through an eight months' campaign for the adoption of the suffrage amendment this summer, and, if it fails, to have a repetition next year, the year after, and perhaps for a number of additional years, until it is finally adopted. That, Mr. Speaker, is the sole reason why I believe the introduction of such a vastly important economic question at the present time is ill timed, is unnecessary, and that is the sole reason why I shall vote against it and why I hope it will be defeated by this House. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women. In so doing I am not voting either for or against woman suffrage. I am simply voting to give the people of my State, along with the people of every other State in this Union, the right, if they desire to exercise it, of amending the Constitution of the United States in the only way in which it can be amended.

I am not afraid to trust the States. They made the Constitution and reserved to themselves the right to amend it when two-thirds of both Houses of Congress deemed it necessary that an amendment be submitted.

Aside from the merits or demerits of woman suffrage, the question for me now to decide is, Shall I, by my vote, help to give the States the right and opportunity of amending their own joint Constitution—the Constitution of the United States—or shall I help to deprive them of that revered privilege and sovereign right?

This joint resolution will have to be ratified by three-fourths of the States before it can become effective. If three-fourths of the States do not want to adopt it, then no harm can possibly follow its submission to them. If three-fourths of the States do want to adopt it, I submit that it is our bounden duty to submit it to them for that purpose, because that is the only way in which they can exercise their sovereign right of changing their joint Constitution.

In the States of Wyoming, Colorado, Idaho, Utah, Washington, California, Arizona, Kansas, Oregon, Montana, Nevada, New York, and in the Territory of Alaska, men and women now vote upon equal terms.

In the States of Illinois, North Dakota, Rhode Island, Michigan, and Nebraska women now have the right to vote for the President and Vice President of the United States, or rather their electors. This shows how the right of suffrage to women is regarded in many of the States of this Union. There are thousands of intelligent and earnest women in every other State in this Nation, who believe and feel that the right of suffrage should be extended to them through Federal amendment. I shall not by my vote here to-day attempt to deny three-fourths of the States from according women this privilege if they deem it wise to do so. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, as is well known, the State of Massachusetts voted on the suffrage referendum in the election of 1915. A very large vote was cast against suffrage. The first district, which I represent, voted nearly 2 to 1, or by a majority of 8,939, against it. In view of these facts a person in my position who supports the amendment to-day is entitled to an opportunity to express his reasons.

This I will do in a very brief manner. First, I voted in the Sixty-third Congress for the amendment, and I also cast my ballot for it as a voter in the election in Massachusetts. Secondly, I have frequently explained to the suffrage and anti-suffrage supporters at home my attitude upon the question. It is this: It does not seem logical to me that one sex should have the power to deny the right of suffrage to the other.

I have invariably told my friends that if the women by their own conduct and knowledge of public affairs and by an expression of the majority of their own sex showed their desire to exercise the right of franchise, I, for one, was willing and glad to assist them in procuring it. It is for this reason that I shall vote contrary to the expressed opinion of the male voters of my district and the State of Massachusetts on the question. [Applause.]

In response to a question at the hearing before the Massachusetts delegation, an advocate of suffrage remarked that the women of Massachusetts would gladly have a referendum given to them and would abide by the results. In my opinion, suffrage would win on such a vote at the present time.

It further seems to me that the conduct of the women in the prosecution of the war offers still another argument for suffrage at this time. The women of the country have arisen to their full duty and have proven themselves worthy of being the mothers of the fighting force of this Nation. Many of their boys are overseas and many more are going. If these young men were asked in whose hands they would leave their right of franchise, there would be a unanimous response in favor of leaving the question with their mothers, wives, and sisters. [Applause.] It is nearly 15 years since I first saw active efforts on the part of suffragettes, and, while the militants made mistakes then and while they have made mistakes here in Washington during the past two years, I am convinced that the majority of the women of this country have become capable of properly making use of the franchise, both through education and study of the affairs of government.

Certainly I credit the women of Massachusetts and the women of the first congressional district as possessing as much if not more knowledge and intelligence as their fellow women of the country and as being as capable as others of exercising the right of franchise.

In view of these facts as applied directly to my own case and my own district, I shall vote to-day to refer the amendment to the States. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MAYS].

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] I almost imagined that he was trying to impeach the President of the United States, but a little further on in his speech he showed that he himself had not been standing squarely on the platform of the Democratic Party. He blamed the President for recommending this method of securing suffrage for women, which the Democratic platform clearly stands for, and then himself said that he was not for suffrage; that he thought it would disrupt the home; that it would destroy the families of this country, showing he was opposed to suffrage when he stood upon the platform or pretended to stand upon the platform of the Democratic Party. He is now receiving emoluments and honors by virtue of the fact that he stood on that platform upon which he had no right to stand, according to his own confession.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] worked himself into a fever heat about State rights, saying that he would not consent that Tennessee should have forced upon it a suffrage question against its will. Yet I see by the RECORD that the gentleman from Tennessee himself voted to force upon my State, against its will, the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. My State expressly objected to that amendment, expressly repudiated the amendment, and never did ratify it. Yet the gentleman voted to impose that amendment relating to a suffrage question upon the State of Utah against its consent. The question is, Did the gentleman from Tennessee infringe upon the rights of my State? I do not think so, because when Utah consented to join this Union it came in under the Constitution, and it admitted the right of three-fourths of the States of the Union, in a regularly orderly way, to change the fundamental law of the land. The rights of the State of Utah were not infringed upon and neither will the rights of the State of Tennessee be if we adopt this amendment against its consent.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] became emphatic in saying that this repudiated the Constitution, that it took away local self-government. Yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] voted upon my State of Utah this same seventeenth amendment against its will, and he also voted for the child-labor law, putting into the Federal statute a law that no State had a right to say whether it wanted to have child labor or not and regulate its own customs in that regard.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAYS. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The child-labor law does not interfere with any State in reference to its child-labor laws. It is enacted under an express provision of the Federal Constitution to regulate commerce between the States.

Mr. MAYS. If the gentleman thinks that and acts accordingly he will go to jail some of these days. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Ohio knows very well that the interstate-commerce clause was used simply as a vehicle to control the child-labor laws in this country. Some one on our committee asked the distinguished ex-Senator from Texas, who was appearing before us, if he would grant to women the right to vote at all, and he said, "No; except in a sewing society or in a purely woman's association." That is the kind of man you will line up with—who would not be in favor of letting women vote on school matters, taxation, problems on municipal affairs, or anything "except in a sewing society." He is 40 years behind the times. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. At least.

Mr. MAYS. He spoke at length of southern chivalry. I thought of what Edmund Burke said when the lords of England were trying to force upon this country taxation without representation, saying that their dignity was tied to it. He said:

> My lords, I do not know how it happened, but this dignity of yours is a terrible incumbrance upon you, because it has of late been ever at war with your interests, your equity, and every idea of your public policy.

And that is true of the southern chivalry. It is a terrible incumbrance upon them. What the women want is not chivalry and reverence, as the president of the national association said before our committee, but they would rather have the vote to protect themselves than the chivalry and reverence that these men so graciously hand out to them while denying justice. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the resolution proposes the following amendment to the Federal Constitution:

> SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.
> SEC. 2. That Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

It will be observed that the proposed amendment undertakes to deal with the rights of citizens of the United States. The proposed amendment has been introduced into every Congress for 40 years. It will continue to be introduced into every Congress for twice 40 years more unless favorable action is taken. Some thought that it was killed when defeated three years ago. Others knew that ceaseless persuasion and vigorous agitation would continue until justice was done to one-half the people of the country. I have scanned those debates of three years ago in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and noticed that many fine speeches were made. The then majority leader, arguing against the resolution, stated that the right to vote was not really a right at all but a high privilege. Of course, he was obliged to take that position; otherwise he would be discovered in the attitude of arguing that a right of a citizen of the United States should be denied. He could not be placed in that attitude, especially when such citizen had committed no crime, was entirely law abiding, was not a lunatic or an imbecile, or even illiterate. He therefore elaborated upon the theory that to vote is a privilege. The Constitution of the United States, in Article XV, section 1, calls it a right, but suppose the learned gentleman were a higher authority than the Constitution, suppose it is a "privilege," would he discriminate against citizens of the United States in the matter of granting privileges when each is a supporter of the Government, a contributor to its financial necessities, and each of equal intelligence and of good moral character?

Suppose by some political miracle the women of his State or of his country should gain control of affairs political and should conclude to withhold the "high privilege" of voting from the gentleman, would he not protest and complain with great vigor and most persistently that an undemocratic régime was depriving him of his inherent rights? A little of his own medicine might be the best remedy for the affliction from which he suffered.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] made upon that occasion an elaborate argument. He may make it again to-day. He was for woman; he eulogized his chivalrous regard for her. He could yield to no man in his extravagant esteem. He followed this statement by asking this pertinent question:

If women are to demand and receive equal privileges at the polls, in the workshops, and in every walk of life, then why should men be longer required to support the wife?

Apparently, he would deny women equal privileges, not only at the polls, but in the workshops and in every walk of life. They are there, and they are there to stay. They are in the countingrooms, in the factories, in the business houses, in the schoolroom, in the churches, in the workshops; they are helping to win the war; they are in every walk of life, laboring as effectively as man. Millions of them are not being supported by any man, but instead are helping, in many cases, to hold families together. Would this chivalrous gentleman deny them equal privileges, even in these walks of life? His question would so indicate. He asks why should men support the wife? That is a manly suggestion! He knows that in the economy of the household there is a division of labor; that neither husband nor wife can be said to support the other, if each does his or her duty. Both contribute patient labor and infinite care of equal importance. Man does not buy the right of suffrage, or any other inherent right of a woman, by his alleged support of her.

The best part of the gentleman's speech was his quotation from Dr. Shaw, as follows:

The reason men are enfranchised is that, as citizens, they have a stake in the Government. The reason women should be enfranchised is because, as citizens, they have a stake in the Government. That's all there is to the question of woman suffrage.

Dr. Shaw was right. A woman is a stockholder in a corporation. She has her investment in the enterprise; she is assessed for its development; she pays for her stock in good and legal tender. What crowd of male autocrats would say she should have no vote in the stockholders' meeting? Yet that is what the gentleman from North Carolina would say if he were a fellow stockholder.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] exclaimed in his speech:

We are told by our suffrage-seeking sisters that in dealing with this question we should put chivalry aside. "Why, Mr. Speaker," he exclaimed, "that is unthinkable and impossible. Men without chivalry would be masculine monsters!"

Would true chivalry deprive a woman of even a high privilege? He said further:

Because some women want the ballot will not justify us in thrusting it upon those who do not want it.

Would a gentleman, even though unboastful of his chivalry, withhold the franchise from women who have a stake in the Government and want a part in its management because, perchance, there were women who would not exercise the right.

The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], now a member of the suffrage committee, then quoted with his approval the arch woman hater of biblical times:

As in the churches of the saints, let women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted of them to speak, but let them be in subjection. If they would learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home.

No wonder they were ignorant in those days.

Further—

Wives be in subjection unto your husband, as unto the Lord.

Again—

Let a woman learn in quietness with all subjection, but I permit not a woman to teach nor to have dominion over man but to be in quietness.

The gentleman from Florida would not permit a woman even to teach! Where would go our school system? Would not let her have a voice in church! Where would go our churches? Compel her to remain in subjection! He would bring back the days of slavery, merely changing the color of the subjects.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] said it would infringe upon our sacred theory of federal union of self-governing States. Yet he supported and voted for the child-labor law, denying to those States the prerogative of governing their children and of enforcing their own regulations as to child labor.

Also, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who seemed to lead the debate on the rule that day, after saying it was the most important question before the House in 40 years, said each State should be left free to individually control all questions relating to suffrage, still the gentleman voted for a constitutional amendment providing for the direct election of United States Senators. He loudly proclaimed that he would not have the General Government interfering with the State in matters of suffrage, yet he voted to force upon my State against its expressed will his solution of this suffrage question. I am glad he did so, because Utah was then afflicted with a reactionary government as obnoxious as ever impeded the progress of a commonwealth. Through the help of the women voters of that State, they have relegated that régime to oblivion. Did the gentleman infringe upon the rights of my State? I think not, because in voluntarily becoming a member of the Union my State recognized the constitutional right of a three-fourths majority to amend the Constitution. Shall one State assist in forcing what it considers a good thing upon unyielding States and then be permitted to invoke the time-worn doctrine of States' rights to prevent the majority from amending the fundamental law in the perfectly regular and constitutional manner?

Another gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], who with keen-edged logic always cuts close to the heart of a subject, made in his speech on that occasion this significant statement:

I shall leave out all question of State rights. My respect for the phrase and logic has in the last few weeks largely diminished. I have found that largely every man of either side can use, or professes to, the doctrine of State rights to favor his contention.

The gentleman from Arkansas, who favored the prohibition amendment but has opposed this resolution and some others, cleverly elaborated this point the other day, and demonstrated from the record that the statement made by the gentleman from Texas, just quoted, was entirely correct.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] expressed uncertainty as to whether a majority of his people favored equal suffrage. He thought many women opposed it bitterly upon the ground that it will tend to degrade rather than exalt the womanhood of the State. He said:

There was also a fear among women that manly men would not love and esteem them if the responsibility of voting should be thrust upon them.

That is surely a weighty argument, worthy of the distinguished gentleman; but can not he believe the evidence and accept the assurance of nearly half the States of the Union?

The gentleman from Alabama, Dr. Abercrombie, spoke against the resolution but uttered this impressive sentence:

One of the most hopeful results of the spread of education and democracy is that which reveals itself in the gradual emancipation of woman.

He felt bound, however, by some caucus action with which, fortunately, we are not handicapped to-day.

The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Bowdle, who appeared to be the humorist of the House in his day and time, said in his speech that his wife and sister both wanted to vote, but he did not think it safe for man's sacred prerogatives to permit them to do it. He could trust them to teach his schools, train his children, to run his church, but not to vote. He would let them pay taxes, but would deny them representation. He made the unique argument that it was on account of their ignorance, and said he had formed his opinion by taking account on a street car, on seven trips, of the number of men and women reading the newspaper; also by consulting a Jewish newsboy on Pennsylvania Avenue. This was high authority, but he forgot that statistics show women quite as intelligent as men, though they may not read the sporting page of the morning papers quite so generally. They read in the home, they attend lectures, they hear speeches, they attend political meetings, in this House they listen attentively to debates from the galleries, and are quite the equals of man in all the pursuits of life which they wish to enter. This gentleman, as well as a gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. SLOAN, wanted the question left to the women themselves, but the gentleman from Nebraska said there should be no dissenting voice. He wanted to govern by unanimous consent. He would permit a feeble minority to deprive the majority of women of the franchise.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who always utters extravagant praise but denies simple justice to what he terms the divine feminine, wanted the subject left to each State and expressed the fear that the negro women might enter politics. In this he took counsel of his fear instead of his chivalry. Surely rendering justice to their women will not disable the Southern people from handling their peculiar problems. Regulations may, of course, be imposed. I have a table here which purports to show the number of negro men and women in each of 11 southern States. In all but 2 of the 11 the white women outnumber both negro men and women. This being true, it is sufficient to say that the white women, if they are of the same spirit as the white women of my section, will far outvote the colored women. If not, they should cheerfully submit for a while to negro domination. Of such submission, however, I believe there is not a particle of danger.

In this connection I am reminded that many benevolent lovers of the negro race, who admire them from a distance, from States like Massachusetts and others, have precipitated sectional arguments of much bitterness by insisting that negroes in the South be allowed to vote without restriction, while they and other States denied the right of their women to vote. It occurred to me then, and I think now that when a white woman pays her taxes, helps support the Government, takes care of her home, looks after the education and welfare of her children, attends to her duties faithfully and modestly, as a teacher, as a doctor, as a minister, she is almost as good as a negro and her rights should receive some of the generous and benevolent attention which these philanthropists extend to the negro race.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] made a peculiar argument that day. He opposed the resolution solely because he thought it would not pass, although voicing his belief in the eternal verity of the principle. What reform would ever be effected under his plan? The world admires and always will admire the man who is willing to stand alone and go down to defeat for what he believes to be right. Such men and women are the pioneers of progress.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] spoke that day against the resolution. He repudiated, however, two of the arguments of his fellow opponents. He said in part:

I believe that if they were given the ballot and should exercise it that they would maintain on the political field and in the booth that high standard of womanhood which characterizes their everyday life in their home and the social circle and that this standard would be maintained by all good women.

That is the type of chivalry to be admired, rather than the sort which pretends to worship, but will refuse to treat justly. Along the same line spoke the gentleman from Indiana, who opposed the resolution, but who said:

I do not believe, as gentlemen seem to believe, that women are unqualified for the right of franchise. On the contrary, I believe that they are qualified for it, and would use it to good advantage. I do not believe, as some believe, that to exercise the franchise would pull them down into the dirty mire of politics. On the contrary, if we have dirty politics they would cleanse the same and elevate the standard.

This gentleman voted against the resolution, because of the defeat of his proposed amendment, submitting the question to conventions instead of to legislatures. In that memorable debate we observed that gentlemen depended upon the following arguments to justify their opposition:

First. That suffrage was not a right, but a privilege.

Second. That there would be danger of negro domination in the South.

Third. That women did not want it.

Fourth. That they could vote through their husbands (8,000,000 have no husbands).

Fifth. That it would pollute the womanhood of the country.

Sixth. That it would infringe on the constitutional rights of the State.

Seventh. That it could best be secured through State action.

Probably the most important reason of all against the reform was not mentioned, namely, that women, if voting, would be dangerously unfriendly to the liquor traffic. It may be that friends of the saloon should vote against the resolution to-day, unless their love of justice and fair play is greater than their love of the institution called the saloon. On December 17, a day which will always be memorable in the history of legislation, we passed a resolution submitting the prohibition amendment. If this equal suffrage resolution should pass and should precede the other in adoption, undoubtedly the vote of the women would assist in carrying the necessary number of States for the prohibition amendment. If prohibition carries first, opposition to equal suffrage will evaporate. The striking similarity between the list of negative votes on both subjects is evidence of this fear. I observe that only 21 gentlemen voted for woman suffrage three years ago who voted against the prohibition amendment on December 17 last, while 104 voted against both amendments. This is significant, indeed. I note in the RECORD an interesting incident in the House in the debate on suffrage three years ago. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] interrupting the gentleman from Michigan, said his State had defeated woman suffrage by 182,000 majority.

The gentleman from Michigan replied that Michigan had also defeated woman suffrage, but that the liquor interests had stolen the election. There was such confusion and cheering in the galleries that the Speaker had to make such vigorous efforts to preserve order that the gentleman from Michigan thought he was being called off the floor. The Speaker explained, and threatened to clear the galleries. One of the gentlemen, Mr. SABATH, voted for equal suffrage, though opposing prohibition. He believed it to be righteous that he should vote for suffrage, and incidentally his State had gone for suffrage and the women were voting out there; so, in fact, had practically all the States from whence came those who acted so strangely as to vote for suffrage while opposing prohibition. That was the reason given the other day by the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER]. So it happens that men's opinions are civilized by the practical operations of equal suffrage wherever it is adopted. Some say that pro-Germans and pacifists are back of this movement. This movement was full fledged before anyone heard the name pro-German or pacifist. The efficient work that friends of equal suffrage are rendering in the death grapple with autocracy brands the assertion as vile and slanderous. It should be noted that the soldiers at the front voted 2 to 1 for suffrage.

Some say to-day that they are ashamed of the action of the militants in picketing the White House and the Capitol. So are we all; but we should be more ashamed of the unreasonable stubbornness on the part of men who refuse them the justice they have so long and patiently asked. Every reform has the overzealous, but it would be a narrow-gauged statesmanship which would let such incidents decide the action to take.

By reviewing the arguments against this reform we find that most all are sufficiently refuted by speakers on the same side. Some charge that women are not intelligent enough. A gentleman on the same side of the question repudiated the statement. Some say that the standard of womanhood would be lowered. Others on the same side emphatically deny it. Some say it would be an infringement upon State rights. Others on the same side of the question assert that this is only a convenient contention. The opponents have disproved their own arguments which are entitled to any weight, excepting perhaps the contention that the reform can best be secured by State action. There are serious obstacles in the way of State action. It might be far into the distant future before the constitution of some States, with men only voting, could be changed in this regard. In the meantime unjust discriminations would prevail. Citizens of the United States removing to and owning property in such State would suffer the injustice of taxation without representation.

Equal suffrage has been tried in many of the States in the Union and is adopted in most of the really civilized nations of the world. Wherever tried and adopted the effect is uniformly wholesome. No nation has taken a step backward. No State has ever abolished it. Every Representative here to-day from a State civilized and progressive enough to render justice to one-half the citizenship will vote for this resolution.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored in this Congress, to the best of my ability and judgment, to so speak and vote as to give the greatest aid possible in upholding the honor and the dignity of the United States. I have endeavored first to decide whether or not the proposition presented was right and just, and, second, whether it would aid in the successful carrying on of the present war. In arriving at the decision as what best to do I have been governed in a large measure by the recommendations of the President, recognizing as I do that he is the responsible head of the Government of the United States and the Commander in Chief of the Army and of the Navy. So far I have not taken any position during this Congress contrary to his recommendations. [Applause.] I believe thoroughly and earnestly it is right, just, and proper to give the vote to the women of America. [Applause.] I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it will aid in this great war to give this recognition at this time to the American women. I believe it will help in every way in showing to them that the burdens and great sacrifices they are making, and which are equal to the men who are engaged in this war, are appreciated fully by the Congress. The great State of Missouri, which I have the honor, in part, to represent here, has not yet given an opportunity to women to vote upon any proposition, but I am in favor of giving it to them now.

I did my best to bring this about in the past and voted to give that right to the women of Missouri whenever the opportunity presented itself. When the roll is called to-day in this House that patriotic State will not only be for woman suffrage by a big majority but every vote cast here by the membership of this House, with the exception of one, will be in favor of the enfranchisement of the women of America. [Applause.] The great city of St. Louis, which I have the honor in part to represent, through the Republican Party organization of that city some weeks ago took action and unanimously indorsed the Susan B. Anthony amendment. [Applause.] The mayor of our city, a Republican, serving now going on six years, has officially time and again spoken in favor of this amendment and there is every evidence that the people in my city want to give this right and this opportunity to women because it is just. The women of Missouri ask this privilege and I, as one of their representatives here, endeavoring to represent them as well as the male sex, am ready to give it to them and hope the time may soon come when the necessary three-fourths of the States will ratify this amendment, which we ought and I believe will submit, so far as this House is concerned, to the States to-day. And, Mr. Speaker, if there were more evidences needed of the desire of the people to have this done, if there were more evidences that it is right and just, and if there were more evidences that it is a war measure in truth and in fact, I could state them here to-day. I need only call attention to the lady from Montana sitting in this House and say to you that this is one of the very best evidences that we should give the right of suffrage to the women of America. [Applause.] I would be glad to see more of them come if they came as capable and well able to help the people as she. I am willing to let down the bars of opportunity for the women of America to do their part in government and in the management of this great war. Franchise to them will help in State and municipal government as well as from a national standpoint. Mr. Speaker, there should be no sectionalism in this question. The women of America are patriotic and worthy in all sections, and we should all vote for this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary when that committee had charge of the woman-suffrage resolution I voted to return favorably the Susan B. Anthony amendment. I also filed minority views touching the resolution (H. J. Res. 1), and which views are as follows:

The Federal amendment for woman suffrage should be passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress for the following reasons:

1. It is fundamentally just. The principle on which the American Government was established—that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed—demands it.

That woman is industrially and legally an individual and not a mere family factor in the social system is no longer a matter of argument. Logic demands that she be a political entity as well.

2. The justice of the principle of woman suffrage has already been admitted in 12 States. Half a century ago it was proved that a democracy can not exist half slave and half free economically. It is clear it can not continue to do so politically. Recently Mr. Root has said "the world can not be half democratic and half autocratic. It must be all democratic or all Prussian. There can be no compromise." No more can one country be half democratic and half autocratic; part of its States ruled by the voice of all the people, the rest ruled by an autocracy of sex.

3. Woman suffrage is inevitable. It is plainly written in the signs of the times. The only question is when and how.

Women and men throughout the United States—and the civilized world generally, for that matter—have come to understand that real democracy must recognize the political freedom of women as well as men. Opposition still blocking their enfranchisement comes mainly from two classes of people: (1) Those whose private interests are best served by the status quo, and (2) those whose minds are inherently reactionary. It is folly to oppose longer a measure so imminent. New York ought to point the trend of the times to even the blindest.

Moreover there is a peculiar fitness in Congress adjusting the grievances of women, for Congress and the legislatures are the nearest approach to representation that voteless women have, since their Members are apportioned among the several States on the basis of population and not on the number of voters.

4. The time for national action has come.

Educational propaganda as a means of extending the suffrage through the States has done its work. The College Suffrage League, which has been active for many years, held its last meeting in Washington on December 15, 1917, "because its work is finished." It set out to convert the women in the colleges to suffrage for women. It now finds college women so generally suffragists that there is nothing for the league to do. This fact is tremendously significant. What is true of the colleges is true outside. It means that the chief business of suffrage organizations is no longer educational, that there is no longer such need to convert large numbers of men and women to the faith. It must therefore become political; that is, to induce the few in power to grant the demands of the many. Briefly, woman suffrage is no longer a subject for educational propaganda but for political pressure.

The passage of the Federal amendment would conserve the time and energy and money, not to mention the good will, spent in State campaigning, and divert it to war service.

5. Never was there a time so fitted to passing this measure as now. Never was there a measure so suited to the times.

"We are fighting for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government," said President Wilson, defining our position in this world war. What better pledge of the sincerity of the purpose of the Government than to give to the women of the United States a voice in their Government—when they with the men of their country are giving all they have to make this principle safe throughout the world.

To insure democracy at home in the one concrete case before the country is to strengthen confidence in the Government's declaration of the purpose of the war—democracy. It will dissipate the fears of thousands of working men and women that the war to establish the principle of democracy throughout the world does not always mean its application at home. It will make for devotion and singleness of purpose in the prosecution of the supreme task of the moment—the world war.

The reaction of the passage of this bill on the minds of the people will be salutary—the people who are far away from the operations of cabinets, commissioners, and generals, but who are close to the realities of life, to the sufferings and sacrifices of the war, who get their opinions through vague and contradictory news reports, may at times grow suspicious and disheartened.

They understand facts where they are confused by words and argument. Pass the Federal amendment enfranchising the women and there will be no confusion in the mind of anyone about the intention of the Government, however slow it sometimes works out. Devotion and singleness of purpose will be strengthened immeasurably throughout the whole United States. The Federal amendment is a war measure of the most definite sort.

6. To limit the time allowed the several States for ratification of the amendment is to trip up justice by technicalities.

When Congress has once indorsed the principle involved in the extension of the franchise to women it will defeat its own ends if it limits the legislatures in their procedure.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, at my home in Texas, I was discussing the woman-suffrage movement and this proposed amendment with an eminent lawyer, who told me that he was a supporter of the movement, and that if the Legislature of the State of Texas would submit an amendment to its constitution to confer upon the women of that State the right to vote he would support it; that he would go upon the stump and advocate it before the people; but that if he were a Member of the Congress of the United States and this amendment came forward for consideration and came to a vote he would oppose it as one of the inexcusable invasions of the constitutional, fundamental, necessary rights of the States, if they are to exist.

It is entirely fit, Mr. Speaker, when the few remaining dignities of the States are being destroyed, that it should be done with shouts of laughter and cries of "Vote! Vote!" Gag rules are historically associated with assaults on the liberties of free States, central or federated, big or little. That practically no time is allowed for the debate of a revolutionary change in the Constitution is not surprising, for that also is associated with an invasion of the rights of States.

It will be recorded when the history of Jeffersonian-Jacksonian democracy, so soon to die, comes to be written that the first, although not the only, voice raised here to-day for the preservation of the right of the States of the Federal Union to control their own electorate was that of Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, a Republican, who is, however, so thoroughly grounded in Americanism that he refuses to be stampeded by political exigency to commit the crime.

Everybody knows, so far as the question of suffrage for women is concerned, that there is no reason for this amendment. The right for women to vote is being granted State by State, and so rapidly that it seems probable that it will be given them in the regular constitutional way much sooner than was expected.

Mr. Speaker, I forbear to say that in my opinion it will bring an era of emotional legislation when it does come.

Mr. Speaker, of Democrats who take national platforms as their guide to political votes in this House I ask, Where is the platform authority for a vote in support of this amendment? It can not be found. In fact, every time a Democratic platform has spoken on the question at all it has specifically and plainly condemned any such violation of the existing constitutional rights of the States as written in the charter of our liberties.

Very few, if any, Members of this House were elected to propose or support an amendment of any sort to the Constitution. We all took the oath to support the Constitution as it is, and before doing so radical a thing as this the whole question should be submitted to the people. Let it be referred to them. Go to the people themselves for orders in so vital a matter as this. I hope no man who calls himself a Democrat or American is afraid of such a referendum.

Mr. Speaker, in the New York World of this morning there was an editorial which, in the main, discusses the amendment to the Constitution recently agreed to in this House. It was referring to the precipitate action of the State of Mississippi, which, it said, it had the unquestioned right to take, but which it may deeply regret hereafter. I ask attention to the concluding paragraphs of that editorial:

We make these comparisons as a basis for the statement that in the matter of a constitutional amendment well calculated to destroy home rule, the States acting as units, the one vote of Mississippi has the same power as that of New York, with a population of 10,000,000 and a male representation at the ballot box as great as the entire population of the southern Commonwealth, which makes haste to inflict upon its neighbors an odious centralization of power wholly subversive of personal rights.

Mississippi, of course, has accepted for itself the policy of prohibition, its right being unquestioned. In rushing with breakneck speed to fasten the system undemocratically upon the country at large, it assumes a leadership which we believe it will have reason to regret. If the other States of the South would retain the political power they now possess, they will not follow an example so inviting to reprisal at the North.

I ask the Democrats from the South who do not want to see their representation in this body reduced to take that thought home with them. At present it is a cloud no larger than a man's hand, but behind it a storm threatens, and when it breaks, as very likely it will, the South will be the sufferer.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, supporters of this proposed constitutional amendment commit themselves for all time to a nationalistic form of government as opposed to the dual form of government as founded by the framers of the Constitution. Nothng is more fundamental in our national polity than that suffrage is a matter for the States. That has been recognized as recently as 1914, in a decision rendered by not only a jurist but a statesman, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, when in construing the suffrage law of Oklahoma and passing upon the construction of the fifteenth amendment, that relates to suffrage, in the case of Guinn v. United States (238 U. S. Supreme Court Reports, p. 364), he used this language. I invite the special attention of those Democrats who still believe in the State-rights theory of government and of those few Republicans who believe in it—and I class myself as one of those who believe in that principle and who has, since I entered this Congress, tried to consistently adhere to that policy. I believe it is the best policy for the welfare of this country to recognize and follow the policy of leaving to the States that which pertains to the internal affairs of the States. He uses this language:

Beyond doubt the amendment—

Referring to the fifteenth amendment—does not take away from the State governments, in a general sense, the power over suffrage which has belonged to those governments from the beginning, and without the possession of which power the whole fabric upon which the division of State and National authority under the Constitution and organization of both governments rests would be without support, and both the authority of the Nation and the State would fall to the ground.

I follow that political statement of principle—not of policy—but of the principle of government that was enunciated from the Supreme Bench of the United States. He believed it not as a matter of expediency, but in harmony with our form of government, that it was for the best interests of the States to control their suffrage affairs. I am unwilling for the West, for the Northwest, or for any section of the country to foist their views as to suffrage upon an unwilling section, whether it be the South, the East, or the Northeast.

In my own State, in a vote had in November, 1912, nearly two-thirds of the electors of that State registered themselves as in opposition to suffrage. Only 14 of the 71 counties registered themselves in favor of suffrage, and yet because in the legislature two years afterwards, in their august judgment they saw fit not to submit again the question of suffrage to the voters of my State, because they had only so recently had an opportunity to express their views, my distinguished colleague, Mr. LENROOT, says that he opposed this proposition two years ago because the sentiment was not ripe for suffrage and because it did not leave it to the vote of the people, and he wishes to change his position, because the legislature of the State followed the very policy which he had enunciated as the reason for opposing this provision three years ago. [Applause.]

You gentlemen from Illinois who commit yourselves to-day in favor of this national amendment would take away the right from your legislature to limit the extent of the franchise as it has done to the extent of presidential electors and Congressmen. You from Maine who are going to vote in favor of suffrage to-day would take away from your people the right to determine that question for themselves, and by your vote would indicate that you view their attitude at the polls in opposition to suffrage with disapproval.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I can not yield. You gentlemen from Iowa will register your disapproval of the vote of the people recently on the prohibition question when they protested against making permanent law by constitutional amendment what the legislature had favored as against allowing the people of the State at any time to change its policy when once this amendment is adopted.

We have given suffrage to a limited extent a trial in the State of Wisconsin. The people of Wisconsin have the right in their sovereign capacity to say how far that suffrage shall be exercised. You who favor this proposal want to put upon the States for all time to come an amendment which will deprive them of all opportunity of determining hereafter what shall be their policy, whether it would work out well or ill.

So far as suffrage is concerned, if suffrage is going to be exercised at all, it should be exercised not by a small fraction of a class but by all the class; and you should not force an unwilling fraction of American voters to have to go to the polls to counteract the action of another fraction of woman voters, and possibly a very small fraction, who wish to go to the polls and register their votes. If you once pass this measure and force suffrage upon unwilling States, they are deprived of the right of ever changing their form of government, so far as suffrage is concerned. I urge you earnestly to adhere to the old and fundamental principle of State rights, so far as the government of internal affairs is concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendment, if it passes Congress and is thereafter ratified by three-fourths of the States, will constitute the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The fathers of the Constitution soon after its adoption quickly recognized that it ought to be amended in many particulars. In less than 10 years after the organization of the Government 11 amendments were added to it. I imagine that the debates for and against those amendments would reveal substantially the same argument made here to-day for and against the proposed mendment.

I imagine that those amendments were not adopted by Congress without a struggle, although they are known to-day as our "bill of rights." At the time of the organization of our Government we did not have universal manhood suffrage in the thirteen original States. In many, if not all, of those States property voted instead of men. This condition continued for more than a quarter of a century, but during the period of the early development of our constitutional form of government the common man, the poor man, the man without property, said "I, too, desire the right to vote." This argument and determination on the part of all mankind to be free and to be given the right to vote could not be held down or smothered into silence. It burst forth about 1825, and thereafter the right to vote, so far as manhood suffrage is concerned, was not denied to men by the new incoming States of the Union, but all were armed with the ballot without regard to property qualifications.

The right of women to vote is not a new question in our country. It had its origin nearly three-quarters of a century ago, but the last two decades has witnessed a determination on the part of women to be free, to be armed with the ballot, to have a voice in the maintenance of her country, and to in all things be recognized as a citizen should be recognized. One of the beauties of our form of government is the fact that we can amend the Constitution of the United States. It is not an ironclad, unamendable instrument, but an instrument that can be amended by the people along lines set forth in the Constitution. [Applause.] One of the beauties of our form of government is that we are not governed to-day by a military autocracy such as governs the German Empire with which we are now at war. [Applause.]

Many able Members have argued to-day that it is wrong to force on a State a proposition which it does not like. This argument does not appeal to me. It is unsound, illogical, and can not be based upon constitutional foundations. Within the last five or six years the Constitution has been amended in two instances.

One of these amendments enabled Congress to enact an income-tax law, and I imagine that some of the States of the Union, particularly the great State of New York, which pays from one-third to one-half of the income tax, was not overenthused for this amendment. The fathers plainly provided in the Constitution the way and manner in which Senators should be elected, and yet the sentiment in the country became overwhelming for an amendment to the Constitution so as to give the people a direct vote for and against a candidate to the United States Senate, and Congress finally yielded to this nation-wide demand.

Will anyone rise in his seat and declare that our present mode of electing Senators by popular vote has been a failure? Some have argued that voting is a right. Others contend it is a mere privilege. No one yet in this argument has undertaken to draw a clear distinction between a right and privilege. If voting is a right, why deny it to women? If it be a privilege, why give the privilege exclusively to men and deny it to women? Why not treat them both alike? As both sexes are amenable to the laws of the country, why not equally arm them with the ballot? Why not put both men and women on the same footing and let both of them work out their common ideals of government together. I care not whether it be regarded as a right or a privilege, the results are what we are aiming at, and the result aimed at is universal man and womanhood suffrage.

No harm has ever befallen any government based upon universal suffrage of its people. We proudly boast that our Government rests upon the consent of the governed, and the only way those governed can wield their consent is by their ballot, and while making this boast we are denying suffrage to fully one-half of our citizens; not only denying them the right to suffrage but making them amenable to the laws of both State and Nation upon the same ground, upon the same terms, and with the same penalties as men. To hold an individual responsible to a law that he or she had no voice in making amounts to a complete denial of justice, and to hold women responsible to law without a voice in its enactment is equivalent to denying them a voice in the affairs of their country.

No harm ever befell our Government as a result of universal manhood suffrage. Women are as patriotic as men. Women are just as capable and intelligent as men, and armed with the ballot there is no more danger of them betraying the ideals of our Nation than there is in men.

Some vainly attempted to bolster up a false argument against woman suffrage by saying that this was an inopportune time to grant them this privilege, because of the world-wide war in which our Nation finds itself. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." This is the propitious time, the golden time, the time of all times to arm women with the ballot. War falls heaviest on women, the wives and mothers who must bear the solemn responsibility of loss of boys and husbands, and why should they not be given a voice when the smoke of battle has cleared away and the many world-wide and far-reaching social questions that will forge themselves to the front then affecting their husbands and their sons as well as themselves? Women are as patriotic as men; yea, in the main more so. Examine the court records since we have declared war against Germany. How many convictions of women do you find for violation of any statute for treason or uttering seditious statements? My memory only recalls one, Emma Goldman, an anarchist of international fame. I do not recall the conviction of a single patriotic American woman since we declared war against Germany, not one, while the court records disclose the convictions of hundreds if not thousands of men for violation of some penal code designed to protect our country in time of war.

You will find no slackers among the patriotic women. The slackers are the men and not the women. In every village, town, city, and community you find patriotic women in Red Cross sewing rooms exerting their very utmost to help win the war, while you find millions of wise men sitting around in stores, hotels, barrooms, and barber shops telling how the war could be won and criticizing the way and manner it is being conducted. Women are criticizing by acts of kindness and deeds of mercy, through actual hard work in the Red Cross. Men are wisely and gravely criticizing by word of mouth and doing nothing.

When the final chapter of this war is written the angel of mercy through the Red Cross will stand well to the forefront of having done her duty.

She has never been denied the right to vote on the ground of her inability to make out an intelligent ballot. She has been denied upon the ground of her sex. Woman has had to fight her way upward from the first rung of the ladder to whatever position she occupies to-day. Nothing has been given or granted to her by man except she won it in the open field of competition. And to-day she is competing with man anywhere and everywhere where brain power counts. Our colleges and our universities are filled with brainy women lecturing on subjects side by side with man, but she is denied a right which he enjoys—the right to cast a sovereign ballot.

In my State the vilest man that walks the highways, fresh from the jails and penitentiaries, with a pistol in one pocket and a pint of whisky in the other, if not disqualified by the court, can on election day go to the booth, deposit his ballot, which in the last analysis has the same weight in the final count as the President of the United States or the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and yet a woman like Ella Wheeler Wilcox, whose poetry and song has brightened every home in civilization, is denied the right to vote solely because she wears a dress. An absolute mockery upon our institutions, a complete denial of justice to the noble, patriotic women of our Nation.

The immortal Lincoln, as such I name him, because he belongs to the immortals, once said, "All I am, all I ever expect to be, I owe to my mother." The matchless Garfield, the beloved McKinley, our three martyred Presidents, all stricken in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, without a moment's warning, in the heyday of their lives, by an assassin armed with the ballot, and yet the mothers of these great men, who gave them birth, taught them high ideals of life, and made them mountain peaks among the men of the earth, were denied the right to vote. The fight is on. It will never down until the victory is won. The women are eternally right in their request and in their demand, and right was never known to recede. Crushed to earth to-day, it will rise sevenfold stronger to-morrow. Defeat their proposition to-day, and it will rise stronger to-morrow. Its strength lies in its absolute equality of justice and right. I hope the amendment will carry overwhelmingly in the House and in the Senate, and then I trust that the patriotic people of the 48 States will quickly and promptly ratify it, so as to give the women the right to universal suffrage. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, it must seem strange to many who know what is going on in the world, "the New World in which we now live," to note the opposition that is so apparent here and in certain other sections against giving women the right to vote. If the suffrage question were as prominent in those sections alluded to as prohibition, many Members of this House would assume a very different attitude here to-day.

What the women are demanding of this body is simple justice. All this talk about defeating woman suffrage is nonsense. This House can not defeat it. Suffrage is here now and here to stay, and, borrowing an expression of the President from his message on Tuesday last, "This happy fact is now clear to the view of every public man whose thoughts do not linger in an age that is dead and gone."

As I have said, woman suffrage is here now, and is here to stay, and what we should concern ourselves about from now on is how we can best get along with it. It has already elected one President, because in California the women vote—"Oh, you California"—and, take it from me, the women will elect more Presidents hereafter, and possibly defeat some of the very wise politicians in the near future who are opposed to this resolution.

Woman now governs one of the greatest institutions in the land—the home—where her help and advice bring happiness and contentment. It seems strange and unfair that she should be deprived longer of a voice in our Government. Women are already helping to bear war's heavy burdens and the country depends on them as well as on men. They are willingly giving their loved ones to aid us to preserve liberty and civilization, and this great Republic can not longer deny them the right of suffrage. Fair play, decency, and justice demand for women equal rights. I shall vote for the joint resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Miss RANKIN I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some exception taken to this legislation proposed, because of the manner of its proposal. The women, in seeking for suffrage, have adopted the policy universally employed by those who advocated amendments heretofore; and yet their opponents come here and say to these women, "You are taking an unfair advantage of us. You should go at it in some other way, the constitutional method is disadvantageous to us." Gentlemen of the House, I take it that when we address women seeking the right to vote, it is a mighty poor time for a man to plead the baby act. Let them have the same chance men have had. If, as the gentleman from Florida suggests, there is a better way to test public opinion, why do they not invoke it?

When woman first appeared on the pages of profane history, man dragged her in by the hair, and for centuries she was nothing but a slave. Then man reached the conclusion that she was an angel, and every novel in our youth told us of some young fellow who told his girl that she should never soil her lily-white hands with work; but the last chapter, as a rule, showed her taking in washing to support an orphan asylum for a drunkard's home, the children of a man sleeping somewhere in a drunkard's grave. It seems to me, gentlemen, that it is time for us to learn that woman is neither a slave nor an angel, but a human being, entitled to be treated with ordinary, common sense in the adjustment of human affairs, and that is why she is asking for the ballot.

In the good old days when there was a home for every woman a woman's place was at home; but the complications of modern society which have arisen because of the many developments of manufacturing, social, mercantile, and agricultural life have forced women out of the homes and into an absolutely essential struggle for existence. Society is much more than sex relation. There are more women working in the House Office Building than there are men. There are more women toiling in the shops and stores of this city than men. The factories are thronged with troops of those whose place is at home. Gentlemen reason in the terms and under the imaginary conditions that obtained in England a thousand years ago—all gone, like a dream, never to return. Every man of us all regrets the day when all this terrific demand upon human effort became necessary to the existence of the human race, but you can not force women into this struggle with their hands tied. She is a human being caught in the swelling tide of life and struggling for a foothold. You must treat her as such. You must give them the same power and the same opportunity that you give to men when you compel them to battle for existence on the same plane with men.

They have done most of the work, furnished most of the loyalty, devotion, and unselfishness and half the brains of the human race for 6,000 years. When they wish to be heard in the councils of society, you say to them, "Ah, you can not fight." This is unworthy of any man that can fight. They supply different elements to the constituency of society. The child bearer has as many rights as the soldier. They are equally important, and if our race has improved after all the struggles and battles of the ages the time has come for this great Republic to declare that fact. That will give us a mightier Nation, a more resplendent civilization, more ideal homes, and men and women who shall go forward—

To that richer life, where beauty
Walks hand in hand with duty.

John James Ingalls, for years the foremost man in the Senate of the United States, was a vigorous opponent of woman suffrage. He was accustomed to say, "In the last analysis government is force." During the recent hearings before the Woman Suffrage Committee of this House another famous Senator, Joseph W. Bailey, advanced the same theory, charging that woman should not vote because she could not do military service. There has been much persiflage and camouflage and rhetoric and prejudice sounded out as against woman suffrage, but the only argument advanced is that woman should not vote because she can not fight. The trouble with it is that it is simply a recurrence to prehistoric and antediluvian conditions under which our race fought its way out of the woods and into society.

Zobier Pasha, still living, I think, in the Sudan, was the greatest slave king Africa ever saw. From a black adventurer in the African forest he rose to be the chieftain of an empire that extended for a thousand miles in every direction. He gave to me the key to his success when he stated he began his career after the first step by buying slaves for soldiers, not for servants. With evident appreciation of the importance of his idea he said to me in his native Arabic, "I discovered that the man who can carry a spear is the master of him that must carry a burden." He spoke for Rameses and David, for Genghis Khan and Tamerlane, for Frederick the Great and Bonaparte, for Achilles and Romulus and all their mighty predecessors who led mankind to fight its way from chaos and its dangers to civilization and its opportunities. He divulged the theory that was the secret of primeval leadership.

But the debaters have forgotten that force is only useful when directed by intelligence, the master. They have confused the means and the end. The voice is the voice of a Senator and a statesman, but the hand is the hand of a Cæsar and a conqueror. If brute strength is the dominating authority of government and civilization, then Moses and Manu, Confucius and Buddha, Socrates and Jesus have lived and died in vain. For generations our mothers were merchandise and beasts of burden, but now the highest watermark for the tide of civilization is one where her loftiest privileges are registered. I challenge the authority of force and appeal to you for the rule of reason. The test of capacity to administer government is not the amount of brute strength which might be furnished by an animal. The only proper method of deciding upon the value of citizenship is the possession of brains. When reason and force work together on equal terms we will have a Christian civilization.

They say a woman can not fight. Why should she? Every boy that marches to battle is hers. The loftiest, most useful, most essential duty of citizenship is not that of the soldier, but it is that of the child bearer. She can not fight? Why should she? The mother furnishes every recruit, inspires every hero. Every man on this floor came into the world at the peril of his mother's life. "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friend." Every time a soldier is born a mother goes down into the valley of the shadow of death. Shall she have no voice in the disposition of those for whom she risked her life? What man is there here that claims he has a better right to be heard than the mother who bore him? "Is thy servant a dog, that he shall do this thing?"

The New York soldiers voted to give their mothers the ballot. Who are we in Congress that shall deny our mothers and theirs that privilege? Arms and armaments are society's chiefest menace. When both sexes are heard public opinion will reflect both the strength and the sweetness of humankind. That society is the most powerful, that government is founded upon the most solid basis which employs in its legislation and administration the most intelligence, and that means every intelligent mind of mature age within its borders. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the limited time at my disposal to pay a simple, sincere, and deserved tribute to the fair Member of this House [Miss RANKIN] who so well and faithfully represents the State of Montana, and who is in fact the real leader and invincible champion of the just cause of our noble women in the American Congress. In all fairness, she well deserves the chief credit for the victory which I hope will be achieved here to-day for human rights, for equal justice, for the blessings of liberty, for the freedom and enfranchisement of one-half of 100,000,000 Americans. The highest, best, and strongest evidence that woman suffrage is a success has been established in this House by the enviable record made by our colleague from Montana, who has won the respect, confidence, and admiration of the Members and officials of this House, from our honored and impartial Speaker down. During my service in this House, covering a period of nine years, the greatest ovation given a Member on opening a debate was accorded to the Member from Montana this morning. It was not so much an indorsement of the subject she championed, as it was a just tribute to an able, popular, and successful woman, who has made good as an honored Member of the American Congress. Well may Montana, the women of this Nation, the Congress, and the American people, regardless of politics, be proud of Representative JEANNETTE RANKIN. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from Virginia use some of his time now?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I will use some of my time. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], the Members from South Carolina are required to take an oath to stand on the platform of the party, State and National; and when the platform of my party in South Carolina was being formed the president of the Woman's Suffrage Association of South Carolina made her speech, in which she said, "I desire that you instruct your delegation to the national convention to vote for a suffrage plank in the national platform, but against a Federal amendment." That was the request made of our convention by the suffrage association of South Carolina. The convention saw fit not to go that far, and declined even to instruct its delegation to vote for a suffrage plank, and, in fact, voted against allowing it to have anything to do with the suffrage business in the national convention, but instructed the legislature that the matter be submitted to the people by proper act or resolution at the next general election. That legislature is now in session, and we are entitled to assume that it will follow the instructions given. So far as I am concerned, I helped to make that action. I am in favor of the State of South Carolina giving suffrage to women. But we consider that the platform and pledge is something more than a scrap of paper, and I remind you to-day that we are at war because this Nation has raised the banner that a contract and pledge between nations is something that must be respected and can not be discarded as a scrap of paper. If that is so, why should we as a party repudiate our platform and our instructions from the people of our State?

Something has been said about the control of this House passing from the Democratic Party and the South. We are a good deal more concerned in the South in controlling and arranging our own affairs than we are in controlling the chairmanships and Speakership of this House and the small amount of patronage of the gang of politicians that are coming to Congress merely for the loaves and fishes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the national Democratic platform adopted at the St. Louis convention June, 1916, says upon the subject of woman suffrage:

We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

Mr. Speaker, the merits of the question of woman suffrage are not here up for consideration. The method of obtaining votes for women is the only question that we are to consider here to-day. I say frankly that when the women of my State want the ballot I am willing for them to have it, and when they do want it they will get it; but the women of my State do not want this Federal suffrage amendment forced upon our State. The women of my State are convinced that it is wisest and best for the State of Alabama to retain its right and power to handle the suffrage question.

I want to remind some gentlemen on that side—and I do not know from the way some of you talk whether the white people of the South have your sympathy or not—but I want to remind you gentlemen in the North that we have a problem in the South that you do not have, and we feel that we know best how to handle that problem. The civilization of the white race in the South is involved in this matter of the ballot. We are working out this question of suffrage wisely and to the best interests of both races, and we ask you, our white brethren and sisters of the other sections of the country, to let us continue to work out this question as the builders of the Republic intended it should be worked out. The States now have that right, and no State ought to surrender it or have it taken from it. There is no necessity or justice to warrant such action by Congress. All the States in this Union that have given suffrage to their women gave it to them through the power now belonging to the States. But gentlemen now, strange to say, want to take this power away from the States and surrender it to the Federal Government. Why, gentlemen, God Almighty will not do for an individual what the individual can do for himself, and surely a sovereign State ought not to call upon the Federal Government to do that which the State can do for itself.

Mr. Speaker, the State can now, and some States have already, granted votes to women. Suffrage is growing all over the country. Let it continue in the old safe and sensible course, but do not, gentlemen, I beg you, strip the States of this vital power and thus contribute to the centralization of power which injures the State and endangers the life of the Nation. Leave to each sovereign State the right to work out this question as it deems wisest and best. You are not hurt by leaving this question for settlement by each State in its sovereign capacity, and it is infinitely better for us in the South to leave this power with the State. Have you no consideration or sympathy for the people of the South? We have grave questions that you do not have. It was this power of the State that gave us relief from carpetbagger and negro rule in reconstruction days, and gentlemen of the House I am ready to stand or fall in the attempt to preserve this power to my State. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentlemen from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I, too, like the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who has just spoken, am a Democrat. And I am as proud of my democracy as he is of his. I am that kind of a Democrat that believes in State rights, that believes in the right of the State to exercise every right which by the Constitution has not been conferred upon the Federal Government. And one of the most important of State rights is that fundamental right of the three-quarters of the States of the American Union to amend that Constitution. [Applause.]

They talk of Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, and of Mr. Madison and George Washington and those great statesmen from the South to whom we owe so much in this great land. Think you, my friends, that any of these men would ever have permitted the imperial State of Virginia to join in a union in which there could be no amendment to the fundamental constitution of that union? Mr. Jefferson had his views on suffrage and so did Mr. Madison and Mr. Washington, but they never stated in any place I have read that their opinions would not change in a hundred years if they were to live so long. In the great State of Virginia at the time these statesmen made the Constitution they had a qualification for property suffrage. Do you think if Thomas Jefferson were living to-day he would stand for that kind of a doctrine? In those good old days the women did not go to school like the boys; that is, they did not study mathematics; they did not learn how to weigh the stars or analyze the sun. They studied music and penmanship and dancing and the cultural things of life, but since those old days we have thrown wide the gates of higher education, and the women have entered in. This is not only a question, my friend from the South, of the right of women to vote. It is a greater question. It is the denial by a solemn resolution here of the right of men like you and me to limit the sphere of any woman or human being that God has made. [Applause.] Who are you and who am I—yes, who was Thomas Jefferson, that he should say what was the proper sphere of the mother who gave me life?

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is always chivalric. No man can vie with him in his tribute to woman. He reminds me somewhat, however, of the man at the banquet in New York City. He and his friends had prospered during the year, and they indulged in a banquet, where they ate and drank until the small hours of the morning. Before the affair was closed one of the gentlemen rose and said:

Mr. Toastmaster, as we sat here around this table spread with the good things of life, all we could eat and all we could drink, my heart went out to the poor people of New York City, the women who have not enough clothing, the children who have not shoes to wear nor books with which to go to school, and I move you, Mr. Toastmaster, that we now rise and give three cheers for the poor.

[Prolonged laughter.]

My first recollection of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]—and he is my personal friend, as you all know—was his resolution for the observance of mother's day in this country—a mother's day—and he pays the women tribute.

He tells us how wise they are, how they can help in time of war. The gentleman ought not to forget, however, what they are worth in time of peace. The gentleman is willing to pay them all of these tributes and all of these compliments, but, unfortunately, he is like the man at the banquet in New York. When it comes to giving them a vital thing—the ballot—he is willing to stand up and give three cheers for the women of the country. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, I stand for something higher. My lot in life may not have been cast along the pleasant lines of that of the gentleman from Alabama. I loved my mother as much as he loved his, but I have not forgotten the pioneer days—how my mother, with my dear father, who has passed away, crossed the prairie, as "of old our fathers crossed the sea, to make the West, as they the East, the homestead of the free." It was my mother who heard the coyotes howl upon the plains; it was my mother who, when the hot winds blew and the grasshoppers came, said, "No, Jim, we will not go back to Ohio; we will stick it out." My mother always did her part not only in time of war but also in time of peace. Some gentlemen seem to think that women's sacrifice in time of war is the great reason women should have the right to vote. In time of war I dare to stand in the Halls of Congress and give you a higher reason why women should have a right to vote. It is this. Women suffer the agonies of hell in time of war, and I demand that women shall have an equal right with men to say when war shall come. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, not many hours ago I left an interesting group of Members who had been discussing this resolution, and reaching my room, unable to dismiss all I had heard, decided to ask time enough to pay this brief tribute to that portion of our population who are not yet included in the American electorate:

It was she who entered the valley and passed under the shadows to give motherhood to humanity. It was she who, through the lonely night and anxious day, waited and watched the ebb and flow of hope and despair as the childhood of the world was guarded and guided by her hand. It was she who taught us to take our first step, to answer to our many childish wants, to lisp our simple prayers. It was she who supplied us the things that would help and withheld from us the things that would hurt. It was she who commended our virtues and condemned our vices. It was her heart that warmly loved, and her hand that gently chided the wayward child throughout the years of tender teens. It was her mother love that was transfused into a nobility of character that proved a safe anchorage in the hour of temptation. It was her steadying hand that led the youth step by step through the unsettled and unsettling period of adolescence, when, if ever, wise council should prevail. It was the memory of her pleading which won the pledge of devotion that stayed the impulse of passion and appetite when absent from home and homelike environment. It was her voice of admonition to which response was open when the call of country was first heard; her heroic sacrifice which buoyed up hope when the command to advance was given; her tender touch which smoothed the fevered brow when the agonies of war filled the earth with the dying and the dead; and her mother heart which suffered greatest agony when war's ravages submerged humanity in its own blood. It was she who clung to the faith that wars will cease, and a better way in the Providence of God must be found.

To her we owe the uplifting and refining influences of our race. To her we are in debt for a higher standard of life, both individual and social, as well as political. To her our churches point to a deeper faith in things spiritual. To her our schools go for the keenest devotion to the training of childhood, for a stronger manhood, and a sweeter womanhood. To her our institutions must look for a firmer grip upon the humanities. On her we must depend for a better state in our political life.

As wife and mother she will always be the queen of the home. As a power of personality she will ever be the guiding influence in our schools. As a spiritual force she will continue to be the chief reliance of the church. As a member of society she will become more and more the determining factor in the betterments of social and industrial conditions. As a citizen she will exert an abiding and a salutary influence upon the political life of a people.

Her nature readily responds to the humanitarian calls of the times. What the masculine character refuses to heed, she, more sensitive to duty, will answer with less hesitancy and without becoming any less a woman. No man, no woman, ever lowered a standard by performing a duty.

Woman, God's noblest creation, man's better counterpart, humanity's perennial hope, the world's object most to be admired and loved! The past has not been kind to her. Much of the world's woe is recorded in her prayers and her tears; much of humanity's burdens has been borne on her frail shoulders; much of history's tragedies, which we all would fain forget, is written in the agonies of womankind throughout the world.

But a better day has dawned. She who was first to reach and last to leave the sepulcher of Him who brought a new life has generations ago come into a new inheritance step by step until to-day she marches by the side of her brother almost his equal in the rivalry of life. America, the first great Republic, the most powerful representative democracy of all history, is now about to decide whether by our organic law, the Constitution, we shall remove the last barrier which denies her equality with her brother. From whatever angle the issue may be viewed, my duty, as I see it, is clear. I will not assume a superior intelligence over her who has in a thousand ways proved her equal with her brother. I will not, simply because I have the power, withhold from her a right which she can claim with equal force that I may monopolize it. I will not deny her a privilege which I demand for myself. I will not refuse her entrance to a field of duty in which her abilities peculiarly qualify her to exert an ever-widening influence against prevalent evils and on behalf of the good of humanity. I shall, so far as in me lies, remove every barrier against her right and privilege, and shall open wide the door of opportunity to her performance of public duty by placing in her hands America's most effective weapon, the ballot, democracy's instrument of command. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RAMSEY].

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, without in any way giving expression to whether I favor or do not favor the right of women to vote, I desire at this time to give my reasons briefly why I shall vote against this proposed constitutional amendment. The reasons are, first, because each State has, under the Constitution, the right to regulate the qualifications of its electors, and I do not believe that a matter of this character should be disturbed by a constitutional provision. Many States have justly exercised the right accorded them by the Federal Constitution and have given to women the right to vote, against which I have no objection. Second, the State which I have the honor, as a Member in Congress, to represent, in 1915, by a legislative enactment, permitted the people of that State to vote upon this question. There was no organized opposition to it, but it was defeated by more than 51,000 majority. Third, I believe this to be a very inopportune time to present this matter before the people. We are engaged in a great war and I do not think the great political agitation which would necessarily result from the adoption of this resolution should be carried on throughout the various States at this time. Fourth, of all the letters and requests and demands made by the people of our State, at least by 20 to 1 the representative women of the State of New Jersey are opposed to this proposed constitutional amendment. Among the letters from people who are opposed to it are one from Mrs. Preston, who was formerly the wife of ex-President Cleveland, and Mrs. Garrett A. Hobart, widow of former Vice President Hobart.

With the permission of the House I shall insert the following letter from J. Gresham Machin, a professor in Princeton Seminary, who writes to me as follows, and whose thoughts and expressions have my approval:

PRINCETON SEMINARY,
Princeton, N. J., January 8, 1918.

Hon. JOHN R. RAMSEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In urging you to vote against the Susan B. Anthony amendment I am not animated chiefly by a spirit of opposition to woman suffrage in general, though personally I am not yet convinced that it is just or wise. Even if I were an ardent advocate of woman suffrage I should still be strongly opposed to the present amendment, which seems to me to run directly contrary to the manner in which important constitutional changes ought to be made. The step once taken can scarcely be reversed. Is a time like this the time to give careful consideration to such irrevocable and far-reaching changes? If the suffrage leaders had the slightest inkling of what true patriotism means, they would cease all divisive agitation until the present war is over.

Furthermore, I can not for the life of me see why the suffrage issue should not be left to the individual States. The chief argument for Federal action in many concerns of government as against State action is that often Federal action alone is effective. Such an argument might plausibly be urged, for example, in the case of the prohibition amendment. But it does not apply at all to the suffrage issue. Every State can choose the kind of suffrage it desires and make its choice effective, quite independent of the choice of any other State. And conditions in the various States differ so widely that the forcing of suffrage upon the women of some States may be an offensive piece of tyranny.

Do the people of New Jersey want woman suffrage? The vote of 1915 was a sufficient answer. Do the voters of the United States want woman suffrage? No one can doubt for a moment that a referendum on the subject in the whole country would give an overwhelming majority for the negative. Do the women of the country want woman suffrage? There is no clear evidence of it as yet, and if the present amendment is passed there never will be evidence.

In short, the present amendment represents an attempt to avoid a popular vote (which could be overwhelmingly negative) on an exceedingly momentous question. The suffrage leaders are absolutely unscrupulous in their choice of means. All fairness, all true democracy, all united effort in the present war are abandoned ruthlessly in the interest of an ill-timed and unintelligent feminism. Do such leaders really represent the women of this country? For my part I do not believe it for a moment.

Sincerely, yours, J. GRESHAM MACHIN.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the proposition before the House is not one for amending an existing article in the Constitution of the United States but to add an entirely new article upon a subject that, to my mind, is entirely unnecessary. Under the Constitution of the United States no amendment is necessary to grant the right of suffrage to women. They have that right under the existing Constitution, the same as the men have that right. Then the only purpose of this amendment, the only purpose it can possibly serve, will be to compel or coerce some State to do that which it does not want to do. Now, there has been a time in this country when that word "coercion" did not sound very sweetly upon the ears of a large number of our people and, to my mind, the word is just as obnoxious to-day as it ever was to anyone. I do not believe that any State should be coerced or compelled to do that which its people do not want upon a question pertaining exclusively to its own affairs. Of course, I can not speak for all of the States, but in my State, by the way, one of the largest States of the Union, the women had the right to vote there for many years and never exercised it. Not until the adoption of what is known as the "Terrell election law" were the women of Texas excluded from the right, and yet not a woman of that State ever went to the ballot box to cast her vote. Why should Texas be compelled to force this question of suffrage upon them when perhaps a very large majority of the women of that State do not want to exercise it?

But we hear it urged as a war measure. Some gentlemen have referred to the action taken by some of the countries of Europe engaged in the war, claiming that those countries have granted the right of suffrage as a war measure, yet they do not tell us that under the laws of those countries they have no general elections until after the war closes. Now, we have no such provision as that in our law. Our elections will go on whether the war does or not. My judgment is that this amendment can not serve any purpose to assist this country in winning the war. In all probability the war will have been brought to a successful termination long before the amendment could possibly be acted upon by the several States.

Mr. Speaker, the claim that is being made for this as a measure for winning the war is far-fetched, indeed; but I desire to add that the patriotic women of this country are already doing a great and noble work, indeed, to help us win this terrible war, and if we now force this question of suffrage upon them in all the States it will be to detract from instead of adding to their efficiency in this respect. The great work they are now doing for the Red Cross and various other channels is worth a thousand times more from a war standpoint than the political agitation that will follow the adoption of this resolution. Political agitation by either men or women at this time can not be made to serve a good purpose from a war standpoint. What we most need is a country united in our purpose, and to give its entire time and attention to those matters that are necessary in placing and equipping an efficient army in the field, and to furnish the necessary supplies and munitions for ourselves and our allies.

But the claim has been made that the women elected the President, and because the President received the electoral votes of a number of the States where the women exercised the franchise the proposition is that all the States shall now be compelled by Federal command to grant the right or privilege of voting to the women of all the States. Whether this claim that the women elected the President be true or not, I can not say, nor can anyone else speak with authority upon that question. The ballots, I presume, were cast and counted secretly, as the law provides, and that no election officer had authority to violate the secrets of the ballot box. We do know, however, that in the State of Illinois, the only State in which a ballot was taken by men and women voters separately, and in which State perhaps as many women voted as in all the other suffrage States combined, that State cast an unusually large majority for Mr. Hughes, the Republican candidate. The election records there also show that the ballots of the women voters were cast against the President in about the same proportion as were the ballots of the men voters.

Furthermore, it is a well-known fact that a large majority of the leading female politicians of the suffrage States were open and avowed supporters of Mr. Hughes, the candidate of the Republican Party, he being the only candidate at that time to express himself in favor of the amendment which we now have under consideration. I, myself, have talked with a number of intelligent women who took part in that campaign in those States, who have invariably told me that they took an active part in opposition to the reelection of the President on account of his failure to openly espouse their cause. If the women voters of those States were guided by their eloquent advocates in casting their ballots, it is very evident to my mind that the reelection of the President is due more to the men than to the women voters of the Northwest. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it has been announced in this debate by some of the leaders on the Republican side that the representatives of that great party in this House are standing almost a unit for the adoption of this measure, and that the next national platform of the Republican Party will declare in favor of woman suffrage by Federal amendment. If it is true that the women were the cause of the defeat of Mr. Hughes in the late campaign, the fact that the leaders of that party are now so anxious to reward them for the accomplishment of that end is the best evidence of the fact that their candidate was in no sense of the word the popular idol of that party.

Mr. Speaker, we hear a great deal upon the question of State rights, and many refer to that phase of the question in an ironical manner. Much literature and propaganda has been sent out in which that question has been referred to as of trivial consequence, and those adhering to it are referred to as having lived in a past age and not up with the progress of events. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that some people do not lay as much stress upon this question of State rights as others do. I, for one, have a great reverence and admiration for the highest principle upon which this Republic was founded. Mr. Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence and founder of the Democratic Party, the man to whom, above all others, we are most indebted for the admirable system of government and laws that have been handed down to us, was the former advocate of this question of State rights. The whole theory of our Government rested upon it as the very name of this country, the "United States," will verify. This is also accentuated by the manner in which that document is to be amended, all amendments being required to be submitted to the several States for ratification instead of to the country at large. There is nothing clearer to my mind than that this manner provided for amending the Constitution was the highest recognition of the States in their joint and several capacities.

I will quote a few sentences from Mr. Jefferson, which I will ask my colleagues upon the Democratic side to consider. In a letter to Mr. Madison in 1786 he wrote as follows:

> The politics of Europe render it indispensably necessary that, with respect to everything external, we be one nation only, firmly hooped together. Internal government is what each State should keep to itself.

In a letter to Edward Carrington in 1787 he said:

> My general plan would be to make the States one as to everything connected with foreign nations, and several as to everything purely domestic.

Writing to Archibald Stuart in 1791, he made use of the following language:

> I wish to preserve the line drawn by the Federal Constitution between the general and particular governments as it stands at present, and to take every prudent means of preventing either from stepping over it. * * * It is easy to foresee from the nature of things that the encroachments of the State government will tend to an excess of liberty which will correct itself, while those of the General Government will tend to monarchy, which will fortify itself from day to day instead of working its own cure, as all experience shows. I would rather be exposed to the inconveniences attending too much liberty than those attending too small a degree of it.

In 1798, writing to Peregrine Fitzhugh, he complained, even in that day, that too little respect was given to the rights of the several States. In this letter he used the following language:

> I do not think it for the interest of the General Government itself, and still less for the Union at large, that the State governments should be so little respected as they have been. However, I dare say that in time all these, as well as their central government, like the planets revolving around their common sun, acted and acting upon according to their respective weights and distances, will produce that beautiful equilibrium on which our Constitution is founded and which I believe it will exhibit to the world in a degree of perfection, unexampled, but in the planetary system itself.

It seems that Mr. Jefferson never abandoned the doctrine of State rights, but even as late as the year 1811, in writing to Mr. Tracy, he still adhered to his former views. He said:

> But the true barriers of our liberty in this country are our State governments; and the wisest conservative power ever contrived by man is that of which our Revolution and present government found us possessed. Seventeen distinct States, amalgamated into one as to their foreign concerns, but single and independent as to their internal administration, regularly organized, with a legislature and governor, resting on the choice of the people, and enlightened by a free press, can never be so fascinated by the arts of one man as to submit voluntarily to his usurpation.

In the State which I have the honor in part to represent we have a constitutional provision for the payment of a poll tax of $1.75 as a prerequisite to voting. The adoption of this amendment would compel us in Texas to require the payment of this tax by each woman in the State, whether she wanted to exercise the right of franchise or not. The tax would be assessed against her upon the tax roll of each county, and default in payment would be equivalent to a judgment against her property. Not only that, but many of the counties of that great State have adopted special road laws requiring those who are defaulters in the payment of poll taxes to satisfy the same by hard labor upon the public roads in the same manner as misdemeanor convicts are required to labor. Under this amendment we could not be permitted to make a distinction in this respect as to the female voters. They would, of course, be compelled to stand in the same category of the male voters, and the people of that State would be compelled, by the actions of this Congress and by the legislatures of other States, to heap these indignities upon the good women of that State until such time as they could revise and amend their constitution and laws.

In addition to this democratic question of the right of the States to settle these issues for themselves, I will call attention to the fact that the platform upon which every Democratic Member of this body was elected contained the following declaration:

> We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

Let every Member of this body who claims to be a Democrat and who was elected upon that platform now cast his vote for this amendment, which prescribes the qualifications for a voter in the election of all State and county officers in his State, not even excepting the constable of Hog Wallow precinct, reconcile his action with the expressed instructions of his party if he can do so. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I also yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, very much to my regret there seemed in the early part of this debate to be an inclination to turn the consideration of this most important question into a matter of partisan advantage, for I am of those who believe that amendments to the Federal Constitution should be considered in a sense of the highest dignity and by the best thought of the body before which such proposed articles of amendment are pending.

I do not believe that the great foundation wall of the Constitution upon which is builded the superstructure of laws affecting rights of collected States in a united nation should lightly be changed by amendment.

Illustrative of my argument, as I shall seek to develop it, I wish to say in my home State of Ohio, as an elector of that State, I have twice voted to extend suffrage to the women of that State.

To me it has always seemed that the ideal American electorate should be composed of the intelligent men and women of the country.

This may be far away in actual consummation, but I believe the continuance of this Republic depends upon the intelligence of the people within its boundaries.

I would go so far as to say that those coming into our country should successfully pass an intelligence test, and I distinguish between "education" and "intelligence" and mean the power to reason and understand that which is best for American institutions.

I do not favor the general possession of property qualification but insist upon the qualification of ability to understand the tenets of American citizenship.

Then, too, I would have the law say to native born and foreign born alike that the privilege of suffrage for either man or woman should always be limited to those who are loyal to the United States of America and who have its interests at heart. [Applause.]

In the struggle for this ideal American electorate one ever true and loyal to this Government and capable of understanding and reasoning that which is best in principle and in policy, we must realize that we face long and continuous processes of education, training, and experience in the determination of the best selectives.

It is because I believe that an orderly process at present obtains under the Constitution for the procuring of the best electorate within the States that I contend this resolution proposing an additional article of amendment to the Constitution should not be adopted.

The real meaning and effect of the passage of this resolution and its subsequent ratification by the required number of State legislatures will be to prevent the States of this Nation from amending in this respect their own constitutions.

This is a most radical and elementary departure from the principles of that Constitution under whose benign protection the United States has achieved the highest place among all the nations of the world.

Section 2 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> And the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Article X of Articles, in addition to and amendments of the Constitution of the United States, provides:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

In all the debates upon the Constitution there never was any contention that the Federal Government, in which was centralized the power of governing all the States, should regulate voting within the States.

To do this, it seems to me, takes from the States an essential element of their very being and removes one of the very strongest reasons for statehood.

The method prescribed by the above constitutional limitations have been followed in all the States of the United States which up to this time have granted the extension of suffrage to women and has likewise been pursued in those instances where such extension of suffrage has been refused; and the recognition of the right of individual States to fix the qualifications of the electors within State boundaries as conceded by the framers of the Constitution has remained unchallenged to this day, save as to the statutory exception concerning aliens and the fifteenth amendment.

As to the wisdom of granting suffrage to women or continuing to withhold it from them, many and various reasons are given, which I do not think here necessary to enumerate or analyze, for, as I have said, I favor it under unquestioned present power of procedure.

During the excitement naturally incident to a state of war some have proposed the granting of suffrage to women as a "reward."

We, as a legislative body, seeking to protect and continue the national life at this time, pass laws to make our power more terrible that the great war in which we are engaged may be brought to a successful and early conclusion, but this proposed article of amendment is a measure for times of peace—not war.

There is no question but that the women of this country rank as high in patriotism as its men, and I prefer to think that the splendid service of the American women in this war emergency, by which they from every part of this broad land are contributing their labor and time to the manufacture of necessities in health and in illness for those of our men who at home or on foreign field fight for a continuation of that great democracy which has given its protection under the law to American men, women, and children is done in a fine realization of their patriotic duty.

That American homes and American women may forever remain free and continue under the rule of a representative democracy American men are preparing even for the most complete sacrifice and American women are sustaining them by a spirit splendid to see.

From the time Betsy Ross sewed the stars upon our first flag until this very present moment our women have done this work, and have nobly done it, and they are doing it now, I am sure, without hope of "reward," proud only that they are American citizens and assisting their country as they best can.

Nor do I think that after the war women will take the place of men, for in the reconstruction of commercial and industrial affairs it will be soon made manifest that while a woman can in emergency do a certain work, as a regular thing she should not have it to do, and certain other work she finds it always physically impossible to do.

There is much that she has done and will continue to do even better than man, and in the homes, in the schools and colleges, in the arts, the professions, mercantile life, and even some of the very light industries, she has worked with excellent result.

We hope that conditions now abnormal may be soon made normal, and we know the readjustment must inevitably be worked out wisely and sanely and with a recognized regard for the qualifications of both women and men for particular work.

That qualification of electors reserved for the wisdom of the States "has been left to the good people of each Commonwealth to enlarge the class of voters from time to time as the ideas of popular sovereignty obtained more force."

The very vital thing which leads me to vote against this proposed amendment and to have voted against an amendment passed by Congress denominated the national prohibition amendment is that to do otherwise would be to destroy the very essential elements for the creation and maintenance of States, to wit, the selection of qualifications of electors and the right of local self-government, and to set up over these a centralized government so wide and so diverse that it must in the end break again into parts of its own weight, and in the meantime fail to carry out good government, for "it is not by the consolidation or concentration of powers but by their distribution that good government is effected." [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the man who to-day votes against this resolution is a man who dwells in the past. He is a man who is asleep to the great events that are taking place in the world to-day. He is a man who slumbers in an age of narrow selfishness and conservatism. He is a man who is inoculated with an indefensible perversity against all progress and advancement. He is a man who is insensible to the great needs of humanity in this hour of civilization's greatest trial and greatest danger. In the debate on this resolution that has been had to-day not a single argument that will long last or bear the scrutiny of time has been made in opposition to the passage of this resolution. The chief arguments that have been made against the adoption of this resolution have been based upon opinions expressed by distinguished scholars and statesmen now living and by others who long since have passed to the great beyond, who were either entirely opposed to woman suffrage or who were opposed to the adoption of national woman suffrage through an amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Almost in every case where the opinions of distinguished men now living have been quoted on the subject these men hold different opinions to-day and are in favor of woman suffrage and of its adoption by all the States through an amendment to the Federal Constitution. I, as one who is ineffably proud of the great men who have emblazoned the history of our glorious country by their splendid deeds and noble characters, have too high regard and too much respect for the memory of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, and James Madison to entertain for a moment any doubt but that if these men were living to-day they would give loyal, generous, and full-hearted support to this resolution. The argument contained in the minority report from the Committee on Woman Suffrage against the adoption of this resolution is based mainly upon quotations from President Wilson. The conclusion reached by this report is, because President Wilson during the last national campaign and in other years gone by repeatedly in his writing and in his public addresses declared himself opposed to this method of adopting national woman suffrage, by means of an amendment to the Federal Constitution, this resolution, forsooth, should not be adopted. But, as has been evidenced in reference to other important civic questions, as to this the opinions of President Wilson are neither infallible nor immutable.

I do not believe that the President should be so severely arraigned and criticized as he has been to-day for having yesterday afternoon by means of his self-arranged newspaper publicity, gotten aboard the band wagon of national woman suffrage by amendment to the Federal Constitution, which, so evident to him at that time, was being carried on to certain victory by an overwhelming majority of Republican votes. He should not be so roundly condemned if he suddenly decided that he did not wish to be left far behind with the minority on this great question. He should not be censured because he may have a new idea once in a while.

While we are spreading democracy throughout the nations across the seas let us spread more of it among our own good people at home. Irrespective of what their condition may have been in years gone by, to-day the women of this Nation possess in equal measure with the men of the Nation all the elements of education, intelligence, and character which go to make up good citizenship. Let us, then, in the spirit of true democracy, in the spirit of justice and equality, pass this resolution, so that the quickest means may be provided to give to the women of this Nation the full right of suffrage, which has so long been unfairly and unjustly denied to them. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 20 minutes.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in the introduction to my remarks I intend to read what everybody is to-day trying to forget, and following that I shall ask that the Clerk read my letter to the Republican city committee in St. Louis, in which they ask that I vote for this amendment. I am going to read the plank from the Republican platform of 1916, and there has not been a man on the Republican side to-day who has denied that that plank was against this proposition. There will not be a man to go back to his constituents, who violates this pledge, but what must give as an explanation political expediency.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Not now.

The Republican Party, reaffirming its faith in the government of the people, by the people, and for the people as a measure of justice to one-half of the adult people of the country, favors the extension of suffrage to women—

I happen to remember that when the Senator from Massachusetts read that plank at the Republican convention he stopped right there, and there was great applause from the suffragists. When they had finished the applause the Senator finished the plank—

but recognizing the right of each State—

Not of the States, but of each State—to settle this question for itself.

There was no further applause from the Federal suffragists. The Republicans did what the Democrats failed to do. The Republicans specified that it as a party recognized the right of each State—and that means New York and Ohio and Michigan and individual units, and not the States collectively—of each unit, including every last State of this Union. No man can now or hereafter repudiate that plank in the platform and go to the people of his country and say that he kept the faith of that campaign. I now ask that my letter to the Republican city committee be read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

DECEMBER 14, 1917.

Mr. JOHN SCHMOLL,
Chairman Republican Central Committee,
St. Louis, Mo.

MY DEAR MR. SCHMOLL: The petition of the Republican city central committee, in which Representatives and Senators of Missouri are requested to vote for a Federal suffrage amendment resolution, which is now before Congress, has come to me, bearing your signature as chairman of the Republican city central committee.

In reply I must say that I feel in honor bound to vote against the resolution. I deem myself so bound because of the following facts:

1. In the campaign of 1914, both prior to the primaries and prior to the election, I stated publicly that I would consider the vote of the tenth district on the suffrage question as instructions as to how I should vote should the question come up in Congress. The tenth district went overwhelmingly against woman suffrage. As I remember, there was but one ward in the city and two precincts in St. Louis County that indorsed woman suffrage.

2. The national Republican platform of 1916, upon which I was elected, was for leaving the question of woman suffrage to the individual States. I again stated my position and said that I stood squarely on the national platform on that question.

3. I believe that there is no more vicious practice than that of legislative candidates violating their public pledges, unless some emergency may arise which will make it apparent to every fair-minded man that an immediate change of front is justified. I do not believe such an emergency now exists in this particular instance. As I have said repeatedly, I am against all domestic agitators while we are at war with a foreign foe.

Should, at a coming election, the tenth district vote favorably to woman suffrage, I would consider that as an instruction for me to so vote here, and I would so vote. But, in casting that vote, I would state that it was against my best judgment as to the welfare of the women of our country and of the Government, and that I voted thus solely because of the majority vote in the tenth district.

I trust this makes my position absolutely clear. I believe I express the feelings and desires of an overwhelming majority of the quiet home women of my district when I voice my protest against dragging them into politics. It is true, they are not as insistent as are the proponents of suffrage, nevertheless, I believe the wishes of these women are as genuine and are as worthy of consideration as are those of their suffragette sisters.

Sincerely,

JACOB E. MEEKER.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested, and I will not use any stronger term, to-day, when men have stood on the floor of this House and talked about what the women of this country are doing in this war, and saying that they should be given the ballot because they are doing it. I have yet to hear one man on this floor say one word voicing the protests of the women who, instead of standing in front of the White House with banners have been making sweaters for the boys and who do not want this suffrage. It seems that the woman with the hatchet is the one that attracts attention to-day, while the woman with the needle is forgotten in this discussion.

I want to say to my friend from Missouri who was talking some time ago about his mother, and his tribute was a beautiful tribute, that I happen to have a mother, as most of us have, and incidentally I think we all have fathers, although a father does not count for much any more. My mother has forgotten more political history than he ever knew, and she knows more about the American Government and American political economy than he has ever shown symptoms of knowing, and for the good of mankind as well as the country she is opposed to women getting into politics.

This talk that you Members are putting up here about the women of the United States wanting suffrage is not a fact. Take your own State of New York when on the 8th of January a telegram came from your own State capital at Albany as follows:

[Telegram from Albany, N. Y., Jan. 8, 1917.]

Miss MINNIE BRONSON, Secretary,
Washington, D. C.:

Three hundred antis met at Hotel Ten Eyck this afternoon, Miss Henrietta Church presiding. Were addressed by Mrs. Henry Preston White. Telegrams were read from 19 State auxiliaries indorsing resubmission. Resolutions unanimously adopted by the Albany branch and delegates for resubmission. The appointment of various committees—legislative and publicity and organization—with headquarters at Albany. The New York Legislature does not meet until Wednesday evening.

HENRIETTA CHURCH.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. No; I will not yield. I want you to think of another thing when you talk about the political advantage of women voting. There were two candidates for the Presidency last year, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. Hughes, favored a Federal suffrage amendment; and yet every suffrage State voted against it. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman who is now in the White House passed out the word that he kept us out of war, and if he had depended on the suffrage States Germany would be here now. It was a pacifist vote.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. I do not yield. That is trickery in argument. If there was ever a chance given for the women to stand by the man who was for Federal suffrage, it was in the Federal suffrage States last year on the Hughes-Wilson vote, and the man who came out for Federal suffrage was beaten unmercifully in the State of California to the tune of three hundred and so many thousand that we never could count it—we just gave it up. Now, you men come up and tell me that the women of this country want this. When you talk of mothers, are the quiet mothers of this country who to-day, instead of saying if we do not get suffrage we will not help win the war, but who are knitting at home for the Red Cross, and sending their work to the boys—are they not mothers just the same as these women in the parade? Are they to be forgotten or ignored?

I ask you, what agitation, forgetful of reason, in the last seven months has been carried on in this country? The spectacle in front of the White House during these months has been a disgrace to the Nation, but it has met the applause of a large part of the suffragists. During all this time those 61 women were breaking into jail, where they got common treatment with others, and then did not want equality of treatment. They came out and have been lionized, while those hundreds of thousands of women who, when the men on the floor of this House voted for war, were willing to believe in the virile judgment of the men who so voted, and who since that hour have with their toil and their sorrow stood behind the boys that are to the front, seem to have been forgotten.

Instead of parading the streets of the Capital, insulting the Executive when he had his guests here from abroad, they have kept on with their work. Gentlemen, let me give you just one thought in closing. There is an old character in Bible history into whose charge one day was given a prisoner of war. After awhile his general came to him and found the prisoner gone. When he asked the man who had lost the prisoner why he was gone, the man replied: "While I was busy hither and thither, lo, he was gone." This Congress has spent more time, and this Congress has been bothered more since the war was declared by the nagging, by the agitation of domestic questions that will not whip the Kaiser in a million years, than we have in settling our minds to the one gigantic problem of holding this Nation together until victory is ours. Whatever it may be that tends to draw the attention of the American people from this herculean task, a task the like of which this Nation has never before undertaken, a task that will call for the resources of all the money and all the blood and life of the whole Nation. Here we are, still pottering around over these questions that have nothing to do with this war. While we are here now, talking these things, the boys at the front in France are not botnering their heads nor wondering what we will do on prohibition or woman suffrage, or any other domestic problem. They say, "Won't you come on and hustle the game up for us." The conduct of this campaign, as you well know, as in every other domestic question, means the taking of money and time and strength and thought and energy away from our great task.

If ever there was a time when this Nation should say with all of its soul and all of its being, "This one thing I do, forgetting the things that are behind, pressing forward to the prize of the high calling," it is now. This Nation in this hour of trial should lay aside and repudiate every domestic question that tends to divide and distract the attention of the people here at home. [Applause.] You talk to me about England granting suffrage. England is close enough to the battle field to say, "After the war, but not now." You quote the King of Belgium, and the King of Belgium says, "After the war, but not now." You quote all these stories of France, but France says, "After the war, but not now." Our suffragettes in this country are the only group anywhere who say, "We first; the war next." The American Government as yet is practically playing at this war program. Every relative I have who is old enough and physically fit is in uniform somewhere between here and France, and the only boy that I have will soon be gone if the war lasts. And yet we men to-day on the floor of this House, for the second time since war has been declared, are getting ready to throw a bone of contention amongst the people of our own country, to disturb and to distract their thoughts and energy. We hear the call of the Red Cross and of all organizations for money with which to win this war. We ought to be willing to answer that call. Shame on the men on the floor of this House who voted for this war and then found time to take weeks of vacations and go fishing, forgetting the work we might have done while the boys are over yonder. We are talking to-day and working in terms of human blood, and it is the blood of the sons of America. Whatever may come out of this vote I pray to the God of all nations that when it does come it will be forgotten in an hour afterwards, and that we will devote our undivided attention to taking care of the lives of the boys who are at the front. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] has just made a fervid plea to you to defeat this amendment because its submission will interfere with the winning of the war. The President of the United States, charged with the prosecution of the war, sends you word to pass the amendment in order to aid in winning the war. [Applause.] It is for the membership of this House to decide now whether, on the important question of winning the war, they will follow the leadership of Mr. MEEKER, of St. Louis, or Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States. [Applause.] For my part, I am willing to take it for granted that the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of this country knows what he is about.

The gentleman has intimated that the women who are here to-day pleading for justice, pleading for democracy here at home, have fallen short in the performance of their patriotic duties. I would ask you where did Newton Baker, Secretary of War and president of the Council of National Defense, turn for assistance when he needed woman's help? Did he turn to the organization known as the Antis? No, my friends; he went to the National Woman Suffrage Association. [Applause.] And to-day at the head of the woman's branch of the Council of National Defense, placed there by your Secretary of War, is Anna Howard Shaw, the honored leader of this movement. [Applause.]

And when your Secretary of the Treasury desired to float the great issue of liberty bonds, where did he turn in order to secure the assistance of the women of this country? Did he go to those who were petitioning Congress to deny women the right to vote because they did not want to vote themselves? Not at all, my friends. He turned to Carrie Chapman Catt; turned to the women who lead the National Woman Suffrage Association.

And did these women fail to respond? Why, my friends, we have the testimony of the Secretary of War himself; we have the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury himself—that not only did they respond but that they were in large measure responsible for the success of those great enterprises. My friends, upon this issue I prefer to follow the leadership and to accept the advice of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury rather than follow the leadership of the gentleman from St. Louis. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I favor woman suffrage because I believe in democracy—the old-fashioned kind of democracy—the kind the fathers of the Republic wrote into the Declaration of Independence when they gave mankind the "American idea," that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed"; the kind for which ten million men are fighting, freezing, and dying in the trenches, from the North Sea to the Adriatic; the kind for which we are pouring out our treasure and for which we are preparing to shed the best blood of America.

Surely, my friends, if we are willing to make these supreme sacrifices in order that Englishmen and Frenchmen, Germans and Austrians, Russians and Serbians may have democracy we will not deprive millions of our own citizens of the same precious gift.

I hold that every human being, unless a convict or an imbecile, has an inherent, God-given right to a voice in his or her government.

Colorado has had equal suffrage for a quarter of a century and our women are not Amazons and our men are not mollycoddles.

They told us women would not vote, but our official records show that women vote in about the same proportion as men.

They told us the women of the underworld would go to the polls while the wives and mothers remained at home. Experience has proven that the reverse is true. The percentage of women voting in the downtown precincts of the large cities in suffrage States is very much smaller than in the residential sections.

They told us that the American polling booth was too vile a place for a respectable woman to enter. The women of the suffrage States replied by taking the polling booths out of the back rooms of saloons and placing them in schoolhouses and churches.

They told us that equal suffrage would disrupt the home, but the court records of Colorado show that in 24 years not one divorce has been granted because of political differences.

They told us that under equal suffrage the women would combine and take all the offices away from the men, thus compelling many worthy patriots to earn an honest living. Again experience has confounded the prophets. Many women have held high office in suffrage States, but the men continue to hold down 80 per cent of the jobs. And here is an interesting fact: Occasionally—only occasionally—we have been compelled to arraign a male official at the bar of justice charged with criminal misconduct, but no female officeholder has ever been investigated by a grand jury.

Of course, the people of the suffrage States are not unanimous in their support of woman suffrage. There is opposition. Ask the saloon keeper who put him out of business and he will answer, with a curse, "The women."

Ask the gambler who stopped the roulette wheel and closed the faro bank and he will tell you, "The women."

Ask the political boss why his power is disappearing and he will tell you, "Those confounded women insist on scratching their ballots."

Equal suffrage by Federal amendment may be delayed, but it can not be defeated.

In the next presidential campaign both great political parties will be compelled to indorse the proposition.

No Republican can be elected without the vote of the States where women are enfranchised. No Democrat can be defeated if he can secure those votes.

Fortunately for us the Republicans wabbled on this issue in the last campaign. If they had indorsed the Federal amendment, Charles E. Hughes might have succeeded Woodrow Wilson as President of the United States.

They will not repeat the blunder, and if the Democratic Party is to continue to rule this country it must display a willingness and capacity to meet this issue.

The greatest living Missourian, CHAMP CLARK, of Bowling Green, once said: "Two things are coming as surely as death and taxes: One is prohibition and the other is woman suffrage."

A few weeks ago Congress submitted the prohibition amendment. Now let us fulfill the remainder of the prophecy by casting a two-thirds vote for the suffrage amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I feel that my duty as a Massachusetts Congressman calls upon me for something more than merely recording my vote on the referendum that will place the woman-suffrage amendment to our Constitution before the legislature of my State. Merely to vote in favor of referring this question to the Massachusetts Legislature might leave a doubt as to my views on the merits of the question itself, and I now address myself to the fundamental rights, privileges, and duties of the women of America, as I see them reflected in the mirror of Massachusetts history.

To my mind woman suffrage—equal rights under the law—is sound Massachusetts doctrine. It was in Worcester, Mass., over a half century ago that the first woman suffrage convention in the world was held. The call for that convention was signed by Lucy Stone, Lucretia Mott, William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and Ralph Waldo Emerson—an array of intellectuals whose thoughts are now spread upon the pages of the world's history. It was at that convention that Phillips, at the zenith of his powers in epigrammatic statement, speaking on democracy said: "The granting of suffrage to women is the corner stone."

Since then we have seen the great progress of the movement, State after State, nation after nation coming into line. Always some opposition to meet, but never a step backward. Woman suffrage has always held its ground. It has never been on the defensive. The efforts of the antisuffrage forces have failed to stop the movement. The suffrage bugle has never sounded retreat.

Mr. Speaker, while it is true that the great States of the West have taken the lead in granting equal suffrage to their women citizens, I maintain that the inspiration came from the State where the first blows for liberty were struck. When Dr. Anna Howard Shaw made her masterly argument before the Suffrage Committee a few days ago she was voicing the views of a Massachusetts coeducationalist. Her collegiate degree, her degree in medicine and in theology, were granted by Massachusetts institutions. Her first pastorate as America's first woman preacher was in a little town on Cape Cod. She has preached Massachusetts doctrine all over the world. What question is too big for Dr. Shaw to discuss or to vote upon?

When Julia Ward Howe, of Boston, penned the Battle Hymn of the Republic, that sent its patriotic thrill through the Nation in an hour of national stress, she was committed to the side of equal suffrage. Who to-day would dare question the right of Julia Ward Howe to vote on any question involving the welfare of our people?

Twenty-five years ago, when I was a member of the Massachusetts Legislature, a sweet-faced little woman appeared before legislative committees on many occasions. That woman was Lucy Stone Blackwell, known throughout the English-speaking world as "the guiding star of the woman-suffrage movement." Although her life was given over to suffrage, her voice was heard on any and all matters affecting child labor, women in factories, and on educational, humane, progressive legislation of all kinds. I have yet to recall a measure which she advocated or indorsed that has not since been written into the statute laws of my State except that of full suffrage to women.

The life of Lucy Stone was as inspired as that of Joan of Arc. Born in the little farming town of West Brookfield, she yearned for an education, and while quite young put the matter before her father. Faced with the problem of educating his sons, the father was compelled to turn down her appeal. "Women don't need an education," was the way he expressed it, "and boys do need one. I can't afford to do anything beyond the district school for you." But the young girl persisted and finally prevailed upon her father to let her go to college if she earned the money herself.

"I would be glad to have you go to college, Lucy, on your own money, but there isn't a college that will take women."

"Oh, yes, there is," answered the young girl. "Out in Oberlin, Ohio, they allow women to get a degree."

It was the only college in America at that time that would accept women for degrees. So Lucy Stone taught school and made shoes by hand and picked berries for preserving and saved her money to go away out to a little Ohio college for the education that her brilliant mind craved. She did not go there on the Twentieth Century Limited, seated in a parlor car, with a limousine to meet her at the station. Oh, no! The young woman of whom I am speaking went there in a slow steamer, over the Great Lakes, and when she was told that a stateroom would cost her a dollar she decided to sleep on deck to save the money. Think of it—one of the world's greatest teachers sleeping under the stars to save a dollar in order to get the education that she later gave so freely to the causes which she loved. No "gold-coast" dormitory for Lucy Stone! Only the cheapest room at Oberlin was hers. And there she spent four years—washing clothes, mending dresses, tutoring—doing anything that an honest young girl could do in order that she might pay the bills for her education.

When graduation day drew near and the coveted degree was in sight, she wrote a brilliant essay on civil government and submitted it to the faculty. It was highly commended, but the president explained that while Oberlin granted degrees to women they "could not allow them to speak in public, and Lucy Stone must allow some member of the faculty to read her essay at the graduation exercises." But the Lucy Stone of four years ago had changed. She was going ahead. Looking the president of Oberlin proudly in the eye, she said, "I am from Massachusetts, the home of liberty. If I can not read my essay in public, then nobody will read it for me." And she graduated with her essay unread.

The world moves and with it the suffrage movement. Years later, when Oberlin College had reached its fiftieth anniversary and the faculty wanted to observe, in a fitting way, the first half century of Oberlin's achievements, they met and asked each other, "Who of all our graduates will we select to deliver the leading address on this anniversary?" And the answer came, "Why, there is only one choice. Lucy Stone is our greatest graduate. She stands up like a mountain peak among the public speakers of America."

So Lucy Stone, of Massachusetts, went out to Oberlin, where once they would not let her speak because it was not the right thing for women to speak in public, and delivered the "address of the day" to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of her alma mater.

And in this brief sketch of the life of Lucy Stone we can trace the onward progress of the equal suffrage movement. Women have advanced themselves. Their appeal for recognition has been won along the lines of greatest resistance. They have earned their place.

In my district in Massachusetts lives Alice Stone Blackwell, the daughter of Lucy Stone. Like her illustrious mother, she has devoted her entire lifetime to the cause of suffrage, and in answer to the specious argument advanced by the opponents of woman suffrage that women are not able to comprehend the questions that voters must face I offer in Alice Stone Blackwell one of the most brilliant writers on governmental affairs that this country has ever produced.

I am in favor of full suffrage for the women of my State because it is only fair to suppose that Massachusetts women are as much entitled to vote on all matters as are the women of New York State, which is just across the line from Massachusetts. I favor the Federal amendment because it equalizes the voting privilege of women and handles this great democratic question better than if it were left to each State to decide. The idea of a woman in a suffrage State moving into a nonsuffrage State and being disfranchised is settled only by Federal amendment.

A great Persian philosopher once said, "Dogs bark, but the caravan moves on." I think it is time to stop the barking of the antisuffrage dogs in this country, once and for all. Democracy can not live, half free and half female. [Applause.] Let the autocracy of sex pass into the discards along with the autocracy of divine right of kings that is now making its last stand before the forces of true democracy in the trenches "over there" in France. [Long-continued applause.]

At this point Mr. MANN entered the Hall and was greeted with applause.

The SPEAKER. I am certain we are all glad to have Brother MANN back with us. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall use the 30 seconds granted to me to say, as the Representative of the original woman suffrage State, the Representative of the State in which women have voted for 49 years, the Commonwealth of Wyoming, that this is a great and a glorious day, the day that shall see the adoption of the resolution for the submission of a Federal woman suffrage amendment. [Applause.]

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four and one-half minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, a good deal of time has been taken in determining whether or not suffrage is a right or a privilege. From my own standpoint I look upon it more as an obligation and a duty than as either a right or a privilege. It is more a question of expediency, in my judgment, than it is a question of right.

We say to the lad of less than 21 years of age, "You are not entitled to vote, because it is unsafe from the standpoint of the Government that one of immature mind should have a voice in the affairs of State." We say to one of infirm mind, "It is unwise to permit you to participate in governmental affairs." It is always determined from the viewpoint of the Government and not from the desire or the viewpoint of the individual. I have long, long since reached the conclusion that woman had reached that high mental estate which made it an imperative duty on the part of the Republic to give her the opportunity of making her contribution to the Nation by giving her the right of suffrage. [Applause.]

The statement has been made on the floor here that she should not be given this right because she can not bear arms. When did a physical essential become a determining qualification for mental activity? Some of the greatest statesmen in this Nation, some of the most useful men in public life to-day, are men who by reason of physical misfortune can not be soldiers, and yet no one would advocate that the right of suffrage be taken from such individual.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] says that she is a pacifist, that she was responsible for the election of the President, inspired as she was by the desire to keep out of war. My friends, when did the love of peace and the abhorrence of war become a crime? [Applause.]

If you are going to deprive one of the right of voting because he loves peace, you would deprive the President of the United States of that right, who for three years with infinite patience endured humiliation and injury in the effort to preserve the peace of 100,000,000 people. You would deprive a majority of the electorate of the United States, for they, by their vote, gave notice that they desired a continuation of peace. Such a test should not be made, as one's opinion as to a governmental policy can not determine one's right to vote. But it would be an emotional government if she participated, says the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS]—a pacifist government—for woman is opposed to war. Gentlemen of the House, based on my own observation, let me give you this advice: Never determine one's courage by his eagerness to get into a fight. [Applause.] A safer test is to wait and see how he fights after he gets in. Judged by that qualification, what is the attitude of the ladies of America to-day? The mistresses of a million homes in the United States are conserving food to help the country. Nurses are on the front in the hospitals and in the cantonments. I have noticed on the boats, on the railway trains, on the street cars, on the streets, in the crowded galleries of this Chamber this afternoon, the loving, "praying hands" of American womanhood knitting garments to protect the soldiers. [Applause.] That is how they are fighting, now we are in.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add my support to the cause of woman suffrage to-day. In two campaigns a crowd of suffragettes—the same crowd that have been picketing the White House—have tried to defeat me, and in both campaigns the women voters have rallied to my support. I mention this because those who have picketed the White House not only do not represent the women voters of the great West but are absolutely unrepresentative of voting women. I have just returned from the West; and I speak with the authority of the women of my district when I say that they unreservedly condemn these pickets in their actions. But the fact that a few misguided women have conducted themselves as they have must not be allowed to hinder or delay the passage of this amendment.

The women of America should be allowed to vote as a matter of plain justice. If a woman does not desire to vote, she will not be compelled to vote. But, if a woman does desire to vote, why should she not be permitted to do so? The people are made up of men and women. All of them have an equal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. If a woman violates the law, what man goes to jail for her or pays her fine? If she owns property, who pays her taxes? If she is sued and judgment is secured against her, who pays the judgment? A woman in this country can buy or sell, sue or be sued, own and convey property—in fact, she can do practically everything that a man can do except vote.

Why can not women vote? Simply because they are the one great part of the population to whom the franchise has not yet been granted. The history of the extension of the right to vote among free peoples is interesting and suggestive. Originally only the king could vote. Later a few of his lords were given the power to vote. A little later the clergy secured that right. Then the landowners were granted the franchise. Here in the United States we swept away the property qualification and established manhood suffrage. Now we propose to extend this right to women. [Applause.]

All of this talk that suffrage will destroy the home has been answered a million times by the home-loving women who live in the West, where women exercise that right already. Gentlemen need not fear that women will neglect or destroy the home because women created the home. The home does not depend upon government but is the foundation of government.

The progress of mankind is measured by the progress of the women. In the state of savagery it was woman who provided for and protected her young while her cave-dwelling consort roamed the forest or engaged in battle. I have read that woman built the first human habitation and discovered how to start a fire. It was woman who first learned to prepare skins of animals for protection from the elements, and tamed and domesticated the dog and horse and cow. She was a servant and a slave and did these things because of the human instinct to lessen her labor and better the condition of herself and her children.

The distinctive feature of our time is the emancipation and individualism of woman. To-day she is the peer of man, not only in intelligence but in privileges and powers as well. With these privileges and powers are coming a new realization of the kind of dangers that beset herself, her husband, her home, and her children. She is learning that her assailants are no longer in the open, but that they lurk and hide in the results and products of social injustice and industrial greed. She can see that they exist because of laws and the absence of laws. She has found from bitter experience that sickness and death are concealed in impure food which is bought for pure, and in insanitary tenement houses of our great cities in which so many are compelled to live. In other words, she is coming to know that if she is to protect herself and the race she has borne from the assailants that beset and destroy she must be able to control the reservoir in which the water of life is collected as well as the faucet from which it is drawn. That is why all over this broad land of ours there is going up an irresistible demand for woman suffrage.

This theory that the man provides and the woman is sheltered is a living lie, as millions upon millions of women wage earners are proving every day. Sometimes a man provides and sometimes he does not. Sometimes it is the woman who must provide, not only for herself but for her children also. Never was that so true as it is to-day with America at war and millions of men being sent to the battle fronts and millions more to go. Let us remember that "Hunger knows no sex, want knows no sex, necessity knows no sex, law knows no sex, property knows no sex; only the ballot box knows sex."

But the ballot box once knew rank. It once knew income and money and title. The onward march of democracy has swept away all these paraphernalia of privilege and the disability of sex now must go. In the years to come the present reasons advanced against woman suffrage will seem as reactionary and as senseless as the reasons once advanced against the extension of manhood suffrage now seem. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. To see what has become of my time.

The SPEAKER. It has gone.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. How did the gentleman get it? I have been trying to get recognition. I had three minutes left.

The SPEAKER. I know the gentleman would have three minutes left if it was not for the clock.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand.

Mr. RAKER. There are 19 minutes that I have not used.

The SPEAKER. Now, what does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] want?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I just wanted my time. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Of course, anybody who has ever observed things very closely here knows that in one of these long debates some time is lost. It is utterly impossible to stop a gentleman who is in the middle of a sentence. When he is rapped down he goes on and finishes the sentence. This rule provides that the debate goes on until 5 o'clock.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall support this resolution for several reasons, all of which I can not in the short time at my disposal enumerate. Many Members have hesitated upon this question because of the fear that it interfered with the rights of the States to fix the qualifications of voters. However, it occurs to me that this is a confusion resulting from a misinterpretation of the amendment itself.

It does not disturb any qualifications already or hereafter fixed by the States except as to the matter of sex. All educational, property, or other qualifications as fixed by the States will remain as they are now, unless changed by the States themselves. This amendment simply says to the States or to the Federal Government, "You may not deny to a woman the right to vote simply because she is a woman."

There is no question of the right of the Federal Government to deal with the question of suffrage. The framers of the Constitution dealt with it in framing that instrument, afterwards adopted by the States. It so happens that they dealt with it by adopting those qualifications which were fixed by the States. But they might have dealt with it by fixing any other standard which they thought wise. The fact that they dealt with it in that way makes certain their power to have dealt with it in any other way, and makes certain the power and right of the National Government to deal with it in this way by submitting this amendment to the States to determine whether the people still desire the States to have exclusive jurisdiction in this matter. There can be no question that the people have the right to change their Constitution if they desire. The only chance they have at it is by the submission of amendments by Congress. I believe the States have a right to pass upon this amendment, and thus believing, I shall vote to submit it to them. [Applause.]

Already in 18 States women have the right to vote for Members of Congress and for President of the United States. These are in a sense national offices, because they deal with national conditions and policies. It seems to me an anomaly in political science and economy that the women of 18 States may have a voice in the election of a President of all the people of the Nation, and therefore may determine who he shall be, without the women in the other 30 States having any voice whatever in the selection of the Chief Executive of the land. If we could, for illustration, imagine the disqualification of all the men in the country for any reason we would have a situation where the voters of 18 States would choose the Government for themselves and the other 30, without giving the latter or any portion of them any voice in the result. Therefore, considering the present situation in all the States, we must admit that the women in 18 of them have the balance of power and may say who shall govern all the men and all the women in all the States. This condition leads me to believe that the States of the Union have a right to determine whether the Constitution shall be amended so as to give the women of the other States an equal voice with those already enfranchised in determining the policy of their Government, as well as its character and personnel. They have the right to say whether they will do it by Federal amendment. But they can not do it unless the amendment is submitted to them. I therefore believe it my duty to vote to submit this amendment to the States in the interest of that theory of democracy in whose behalf we have become the leaders of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Has the time expired?

The SPEAKER. Yes. It is 5 o'clock. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment. All gentlemen will take their seats. All gentlemen will refrain from conversation, and likewise the people in the galleries.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia rose.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee, I was seeking recognition on this section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana got recognition. The Chair did not see the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I was trying to get recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have been glad to recognize the gentleman. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORES of Indiana: After the word "to," in line 4, strike out the words "the legislatures of"; and after the word "ratified," in line 6, strike out the words "by three-fourths of said legislatures" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "by conventions duly called by authority of law in three-fourths of the several States."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, by Article V of the Constitution it is provided that the Constitution may be amended by the submission, by a two-thirds vote, of a resolution for its amendment to either the legislatures or conventions of the States. Article V provides for amendments and provides for their alternative submission either to the legislatures or to conventions of the several States. An adoption or ratification by three-fourths of the States, either by convention or the legislatures, will be a ratification as fixed by the resolution of submission.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would like to have the gentleman explain what he means by authority of law. Would it be within the power of the legislature to fix a law that would call this convention, or would Congress have the right to do it?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. The legislature would have the right.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose the legislature provided no law for calling this convention. Then there could be no convention.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Congress could supplement it by a provision calling for conventions in the States refusing to call conventions. There is no question about that as a matter of law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman think that Congress in submitting the amendment ought to leave any possibility of confusion like that to arise in the future?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I do not think it would create any confusion or any possibility of confusion. I do not believe there is a general assembly in the Union that would refuse to submit this resolution to its people in a call for a convention.

Mr. Speaker, I am not speaking in any spirit of hostility to this constitutional amendment. A change in the fundamental law of the United States at any time is a most serious question, and should have serious, earnest, and faithful consideration at the hands of the people. At this time, when another proposition for constitutional amendment has been submitted to the legislatures for adoption, I do not want to have so important a question as this, involving, as it does, the change of our whole electoral system, submitted to our legislatures to become involved in dealing in crookedness, in possible rascality, in getting votes from people who are not for it and in losing votes of people who are for it by a trade. It is not right that we should throw the Constitution of the United States into a pot to be scrambled for by the people. It is not right that this amendment, going to the very foundation of our Government, should be either passed or defeated by a deal, should be passed in one State possibly by a deal with the opponents of prohibition and in an adjoining State by a deal with those who are for prohibition. It should not be involved with railroad legislation. It should not be involved in a multiplicity of contentions. The convention idea is the true and the only true referendum. An amendment to the Constitution should go to the people for consideration upon its own merits and should not be tied up and bundled up and hampered with a thousand other measures which occupy the brief time of a legislature's session.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen do not expedite the business of the House by yelling "Vote!" They delay it.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment close in two minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I object.

Mr. RAKER. I move that all debate be now closed on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know whether the rule does not permit five minutes to speak in opposition to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Why, yes; unless debate is closed. It is entirely in the hands of the House. The question is on agreeing to the Moores amendment.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays. I had the floor, and I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right. Nobody is trying to deprive him of the right. Those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Sixty-two gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. A sufficient number——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The other side.

The SPEAKER. The other side is called for. Those opposed to taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-three Members have risen in the negative. It requires one-fifth. A sufficient number have seconded the demand for the yeas and nays, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 273, not voting 21, as follows:

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to have read in my time the paper which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. ALBERT F. POLK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Understanding that the vote upon the amendment to the Constitution providing for woman suffrage throughout the United States is to be submitted to the House of Representatives on January 10, we, the undersigned, desire, as citizens of Delaware and of the United States, to protest through you against the adoption of such an amendment. We believe that the people of this State of both sexes are overwhelmingly opposed to this momentous and basic change in the structure of our Federal Government, and that, if finally adopted, it would do wanton violence to those principles of local self-government in the several States which have so long been held sacred in our dual scheme of government.

In this view it is unimportant whether our individual opinion be for or against woman suffrage. Nothing that so vitally concerns the political and social well-being of a State as the proposed fundamental change in the seat of political power should be arbitrarily imposed upon the people of any State without their consent, and we can not but consider the initiation of such a change by the vote of the two Houses of Congress as an abuse of the power conferred upon them by the Constitution.

From the very beginning and during the long period of our national existence it has been held as a cardinal principle not only by the framers of the Constitution but continuously by the intelligent public opinion of the country, without distinction of party, that suggestion by Congress of change in the organic law of the Union should only be made with extreme caution and in response to a well-recognized emergency requiring the same. The few amendments ingrafted upon the Constitution during this long period (for the first 10 amendments were almost contemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution itself) testify to this fact, and most of them, including the fifteenth, grew out of the emergencies created by the Civil War. The historical circumstances were exceptional and the exigencies overwhelming. They were the outcome of a social and political revolution and seemed to the actors in that bloody drama necessary to safeguard civilization itself.

No such emergency now exists. No grievances on the part of the women of the country cry out for redress so drastic and so dangerous to State autonomy. There is only a desire of a portion of the women of the country to share in political power, and its propaganda is comparatively of recent growth. There is no compelling reason for imposing it by constitutional edict on the whole country and invading so important a province of local self-government.

There is nothing in the manner in which the States have dealt with this question to justify the impatience of the protagonists of woman suffrage. On the contrary, they have reason to be satisfied with the progress made of their cause by the somewhat slow but considerate action of the peoples of the several States. In the face of all this it seems to us absurd to say that there is any such exigent demand as would justify this momentous change in our organic law. Every uncalled for amendment to that law weakens its stability and encourages the recurrent frequency of such demands.

Yours, respectfully,
Geo. Gray, Thomas F. Bayard, S. D. Townsend, George A. Elliott, Alexis I. du Pont, H. H. Ward, W. W. Laird, Henry P. Scott, D. W. Corbit, John P. Nields, David T. Marvel, T. W. Wilson.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw the pro forma amendment and simply say that this protest was presented in behalf of Judge Gray, a distinguished citizen of Delaware, and many other distinguished citizens of the same State.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to go in as section 3.

Mr. RAKER. But section 2 has not been read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read section 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I merely desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the language used in the new section 3 as offered by me is the identical language contained in the article of amendment adopted on December 10, having been passed in so far as everything except the time is concerned by the Senate of an amendment by the House adding one additional year, accepted by the Senate. So that it is the exact language which this House voted for and which the Senate ratified in connection with the so-called prohibition amendment.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Does it contain the other provision that the amendment shall not be effective until one year after the ratification?

Mr. GARD. It does not.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Does not the gentleman want to include that?

Mr. GARD. It is not here included.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. If the amendment is adopted, would the gentleman vote for the resolution?

Mr. GARD. For the resolution in its entirety? I am frank to say that I could not support the resolution. I made a speech to that end. I am offering this with the purpose of perfecting the bill because it seems to me and to many other gentlemen that it is both idle and unwise, to use the words of another, to send an article of amendment out before the people without any time fixed when it shall be returned.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. I can not yield. It has been said in the history of this Republic that there is one so-called amendment which has been wandering around the country for over a hundred years, and surely it should be the policy of this legislative body to impose on every constitutional amendment a time limit. There should be something in the law or in the article of amendment, rather, which shall make it compulsory to be acted upon within a certain time. As I have said, this is exactly the language which the House accepted, with the addition of one year, which was ratified by the Senate. It is to my mind and to the mind of many others a most important and necessary addition to any article of amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment, and I want to say a few words upon it.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Idaho begins, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments to the resolution close in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all other amendments close in five minutes. Is there objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object to that.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment close in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the Gard amendment. I am in favor of the resolution as it has been reported from the committee. I am opposed to this particular amendment, because it can do no good and may prolong the fight looking to the granting of suffrage. One of the reasons why I am in favor of the amendment to the Constitution as it is proposed is because of the difficulties in the several States in amending their constitutions. Here is a proposition that, if it shall prevail, will make it necessary that a sufficient number of the States ratify the amendment within a period of seven years. If they fail then, this question must be submitted to the States again. Here is a question that is virile. It will not be pending for a hundred years and then forgotten, as the amendment to which the gentleman from Ohio referred. Here is a question that if it shall not prevail within seven years will be submitted again by another Congress, and the work of ratification will have to be done over again in the several States. Because of that I urge it as the part of wisdom to omit the time limit in its entirety.

Gentlemen, seven years is a short time in the life of a State and in the life of our Nation. If we are to have a time limit it should be not less than 20 years. Why, the Legislature of Alabama meets in regular session in four-year intervals. In Vermont the constitution can be amended not oftener than once in 10 years. Other States have time limits of 4, 5, or 6 years. Again, I say a period of 7 years is a short time in the history of our country. This amendment may not be ratified within 7 years, but in my judgment it will be ratified within a time that is altogether reasonable.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman voted for the prohibition amendment, did he not?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; I voted for the resolution in spite of the fact that it had attached to it this particular provision.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. How can the gentleman differentiate between the two?

Mr. FRENCH. I would vote for this resolution with the time limit upon it, but I prefer to vote for it without any limit as to time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the amendment tacked onto the prohibition amendment was put there by enemies of the prohibition cause?

Mr. FRENCH. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BLANTON. And this is attempted by enemies of this cause?

Mr. FRENCH. Undoubtedly; and it was admitted by the gentleman who offered it that, even if his amendment should pass, he will not support the resolution.

But let me ask you to consider for a few minutes another phase of the situation. In my judgment, one of the strongest reasons why we should pass the resolution granting suffrage to women is because of the harsh and sometimes unworkable conditions imposed in State constitutions that have to do with their amendment. Gentlemen, in spite of overwhelming majorities and unquestioned sentiment, it is well-nigh impossible for many State constitutions to be amended. Ought we not to adopt a simpler means, and ought we not to provide a reasonable time within which action may be had?

In examining the question I shall merely refer to the States where by constitutional amendment suffrage has not been granted.

Take the State of Illinois. No one familiar with the situation doubts that the people of Illinois are overwhelmingly in favor of woman suffrage. Then, why do they not amend their constitution?

Let us see. The legislature meets biennially, and let us suppose that a legislature favorable to suffrage will be elected. Now, suffrage is not the only thing that the people of Illinois are in favor of. Suppose they want to pass a prohibition amendment. Suppose the people favor State ownership of certain public utilities that can only be acquired by constitutional amendment. The opponents of suffrage can join with the friends of the public utilities amendment and force a vote upon it. The vote is forced before action can be had on the suffrage amendment; and, once passed, its passage defeats the suffrage amendment. And why? Why, because only one constutional amendment can be placed before the people at a time. Remember the legislature meets only once in two years.

Remember, again, that a two-thirds vote of the legislatures is required to pass the amendment, and that it must be ratified by a majority of the people voting at the election. And so your suffrage amendment may not even come before the people. Suppose at the next legislature prohibition has right of way, then the suffrage amendment is again postponed. Well, Illinois is not the only State so hampered. In Kentucky all the legislature would need to do would be to submit two constitutional amendments to crowd out suffrage, and in Arkansas only three.

But let us go further. Suppose South Carolina favors suffrage overwhelmingly. Well, the legislature meets annually. But the suffrage amendment must pass by a two-thirds vote of both houses; then it must be submitted to the people and receive a majority of the votes of the people voting for representatives. Then with this ratification has the suffrage amendment passed? Not at all. The whole question must go to the next legislature and there it must pass by a two-thirds vote of both houses. In Mississippi it is even worse, for the legislature, although on the second vote a majority may ratify the amendment, meets quadrennially and not every year, as is the case in South Carolina.

In Connecticut, Massachusetts, Tennessee, and Vermont the amendment, aside from being ratified by the people, must run the gantlet of two separate legislatures, and pass them both by at least a two-thirds vote of one or both houses in at least one of the sessions.

In Indiana, Iowa, New Jersey, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Virginia, and Wisconsin the amendment must not only be ratified by the people but must pass two separate legislatures by majority votes. In Rhode Island the people to the extent of three-fifths of all voting at the election must vote for the amendment. Remember, too, that all of the States in this group, excepting New Jersey and Rhode Island, have biennial sessions of their legislatures.

But let us examine a few more features. By the laws of Congress admitting immigrants to our shores, and by the laws of our States, not by constitutional amendment, we have endowed with suffrage thousands upon thousands of people who do not know the meaning of the word, or who have criminal records, or who, barely escaping the doors of penitentiaries, are dragging society downward. We have endowed these, I say, with suffrage by simple statutes.

Yet the mothers of our land, women who teach our children, and from whom we all have learned the purest lessons of social conduct, the loftiest ideals of duty to society, to government, to God; the women of our land, cultured, educated, refined, toiling by the side of man, sacrificing in measure that man himself can not ask; the women of our land, I say, must attain their simple right to participate in government, not by acts of legislatures or of Congress but by constitutional amendment.

To attain suffrage in Alabama, Florida, Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, and Ohio, the legislatures by a three-fifths vote of both houses must pass amendments to their constitutions. In Alabama and Kentucky the amendment must then be ratified by the people; in Alabama by a majority of all votes cast at the election; and in Kentucky by a majority voting on the amendment. In Georgia, Illinois, Louisiana, Maine, Michigan, Mississippi, South Carolina, Texas, and West Virginia a two-thirds vote of both houses is necessary, while in Illinois, Mississippi, and South Carolina the people must ratify the amendment.

But not only are constitutions difficult to amend as a rule, requiring overwhelming votes of State legislatures, but many of our States require such majorities when submitted to the people for ratification as to make amendment next to impossible. When candidates aspire to office it is not required that for any one to be elected he shall receive a majority vote of all persons voting at the election. Plurality counts, and the person is elected who receives the greatest number of votes. Yet in at least the 10 States of Alabama, Arkansas, Indiana, Illinois, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, and Tennessee the amendment must be carried, not by a majority of votes for or against the amendment, but, in most of those States, by a majority of all persons voting at the election; in Rhode Island by three-fifths of those voting, and in Indiana, if we are to accept as correct what I believe is the latest interpretation of the constitution of the State by its supreme court, a majority of all the people of the State who are eligible to vote. Do you not see that in these States the man who is too ignorant to vote, or who is too indifferent, may have the same influence as the thoughtful man—the patriotic citizen who has earnestly and well pondered over the merits of a constitutional amendment?

But there are other limitations still. In Illinois when a proposed amendment to the Constitution has been defeated it can not be submitted again until after a period of four years.

In Kentucky, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania not until after five years. In Tennessee an amendment may not be submitted a second time till after 6 years, and in Vermont not until 10 years shall have passed.

Now, let us see how the women would go about amending the constitution of New Mexico. Here is a State in which no educational test may be imposed. Here is a State in which the vote of the ignorant peon or the illiterate immigrant counts for as much as the vote of the farmer, the miner, the business man, or man following a profession. Yet to pass the suffrage amendment it would need to be carried through both houses of the legislature by a three-fourths vote. That is not all. It would need to be ratified by three-fourths of the electors of the State participating. But that is not all. It would need to be ratified by two-thirds of the electors of each and every county of the State.

Let me ask those who talk of democracy, who talk of the rule of the people, how long it would take to attain suffrage in New Mexico? Why, 99 per cent of the people of New Mexico might be in favor of woman suffrage, but if in one single county one man more than one-third of the voters of the county voted against suffrage the amendment would fail to pass.

But some one says, Why not hold constitutional conventions in the several States and in that way make new constitutions? Gentlemen, in all States where conventions may be held heavy expense must be incurred and many problems besides suffrage would be opened to discussion that people have regarded as fixed and stable for many years. Why impose that burden, and why tie suffrage up with a multitude of other problems that would prevent a fair consideration, problems, maybe, that of their own dead weight would defeat the ratification of a proposed constitution containing full suffrage grants? Remember, too, that in at least 12 of our States there is no provision by which constitutional conventions may be held, and that in still another—Maryland—20 years must elapse after the holding of a constitutional convention before another such convention may be assembled.

Mr. Speaker, what I have said is not new. The State constitutions themselves tell the story, and it has been admirably worked out by Prof. W. F. Dodd in his Revision and Amendment of State Constitutions, and worked out in brief detail by Mary Sumner Boyd in her pamphlet entitled, "State Constitutional Obstructions." But the condition to which I have referred constitutes, in my opinion, a most powerful argument in favor of submitting the whole question to the several States in the way of a proposed Federal amendment to our National Constitution. It is well known that the opponents of woman suffrage are urging the sovereignty of the States in this great question. They apparently do not want the question voted upon when a fair vote and a clean decision may be attained. They want the advantage of archaic machinery. They want cumbersome methods of amending constitutions to supplement their lack of argument. They are like the gladiator who says, "I will enter the arena but the hands of my opponent must be tied behind his back."

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I say this: The women of our land as part of our people are called upon to bear their responsibility in every walk of life. How nobly they bear that responsibility may well be the subject of the mightiest epic. More I need not say, only that to them, without question and without asking, should be accorded full measure of suffrage. I believe they will honor suffrage in exercising its responsibilities; but even this is beside the mark. Were it necessary for woman to begin at the lowest rung of the ladder and climb up, were it necessary for her to go through the pangs of birth of responsible citizenship, as the people of Russia are asked to do at this hour, then, still it would be our duty to endow her to the extent that is in our power with the means of full participation in the affairs of state.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 158, nays 247, not voting 22, as follows:

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the joint resolution was passed.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD and Mr. REED (for) with Mr. DUNN (against).

Mr. IRELAND and Mr. LAGUARDIA (for) with Mr. PADGETT (against).

Mr. CURRY of California and Mr. MILLER of Washington (for) with Mr. HOLLAND (against).

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (for) with Mr. COOPER of West Virginia (against).

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, my colleague Mr. DRUKKER, of New Jersey, absent on account of illness, had he been present would have voted "nay."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. IRELAND, is absent on account of being in a railroad wreck. If he had been present, he would have voted "yea."

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "nay."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening?

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes; I vote "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the gentleman have to answer the question that he was in the Hall listening when his name was called?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask that the question be put to him in that shape.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the gentleman has made some inquiry as to my vote. I would state that I was in the Hall when the second roll call was called, and my name was not called at the proper time when it should have been called.

Mr. AUSTIN. I heard the gentleman's name called, Mr. Speaker. I ask that this question be put to him: "Was he listening at the time his name was called?"

Mr. DOMINICK. I was sitting by Congressman LEVER at the time, and I was listening, and my name was not called, the gentleman's statement to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. AUSTIN. I say his name was called. I heard it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, he qualifies.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will all keep still until the Speaker can rule. The gentleman brings himself within the rule. [Applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. RUSSELL. I was. I thought I voted on the first roll call. It may be that I am not recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will look and see. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. RUSSELL. I was in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman state that he was in the Hall listening when his name was called and failed to hear it, or does he state that he voted?

Mr. RUSSELL. I thought I voted on the first roll call.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. RUSSELL, and he voted "aye."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a recapitulation of this vote. It is exceedingly close.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands a recapitulation of the vote, and the Clerk will recapitulate it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, is that a matter of right for any Member to demand it?

The SPEAKER. It is a matter of right. It has been fought out here a number of times. It is in the discretion of the Speaker, but nevertheless and notwithstanding when any man demands a recapitulation he ought to have it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentlemen have the right to change their votes on recapitulation or cast their votes according to the original roll call?

The SPEAKER. It will simply be as the lists show. Members will please be seated. There is no sense in recapitulating the vote unless Members can hear.

The Clerk recapitulated the vote.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, how was my name called?

The SPEAKER. Mr. CARLIN voted in the negative.

The result was announced as above recorded.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RAKER. I make the motion, Mr. Speaker, to reconsider the vote and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman can not make that motion. The gentleman can move to reconsider, but he can not move to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] moves to reconsider——

Mr. RAKER. And lay that motion on the table.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No.

The SPEAKER. You can not.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 11, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we bless Thee for the assurance of Thy presence with us as a nation and Thy guidance—an assurance that keeps us calm under provocation such as never before tried a nation in the history of the world. We pray that Thou wilt still abide with us with the constant ministry of Thy Spirit, and while our spirits are unconquerable and we move forward in the midst of the conflict of the world yet may there be calm and peace in our hearts because of our oneness of life and purpose with Thee. Guide us this day in the discharge of our duties. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Res. 200) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JAMES. I present a resolution adopted unanimously by the Kentucky Senate approving the course pursued by President Wilson and the administration in attempting to stamp out autocracy and to use every effort to conserve that the men of this Nation now in the trenches can be protected while fighting for the cause of democracy. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

SENATE COMMENDS WILSON—RESOLUTION INTRODUCED BY JAY W. HARLAN ADOPTED UNANIMOUSLY.

FRANKFORT, KY., January 8.

Patriotism was the keynote of the opening session of the Kentucky Senate this afternoon and each mention of the great conflict in which this country is engaged with the European allies was received with profound respect by the members of the body and those who filled the gallery. By a unanimous vote of the entire membership the senate went on record, approving the course pursued by President Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic administration in attempting to stamp out autocracy and to use every effort to conserve that the men of this Nation now in the trenches can be protected while fighting for the cause of democracy.

The resolution commending the President was offered by Jay W. Harlan, of Boyle County, and was adopted by a rising vote. Following is the resolution in full:

"Whereas our Nation has championed the cause of justice, humanity, and democracy, and we have taken up arms in defense of the priceless heritage won for and devised to us by our forefathers: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, in session assembled:

"First. That we most highly commend our beloved and esteemed President, Woodrow Wilson, and his administration for their wise and patriotic decisions and actions in handling the many perplexing problems that have arisen since their incumbency pertaining to our national integrity and interest; that we assure him and them that no true American can deny the justice of our national position in the present conflict between democracy and autocracy, humanity and barbarism, liberty and oppression; that we assure the President, his administration, and the Nation that we heartily indorse and will unqualifiedly support our present international position in this conflict.

"Second. That we make the welfare of our Nation the guiding motive in this present session, sacrificing all individual ambitions, political or factional prejudices, and will work and cooperate solely for the good of our Nation and State.

"Third. That we do now call upon every citizen of this Commonwealth to comply with all requests and suggestions made by our national administration in order to conserve our resources and strengthen our position.

"Fourth. That we unqualifiedly and severely condemn any whose action or desire is contrary to the interest of our common cause, and call upon all true Kentuckians to see that such a disloyal resident is awarded his just deserts.

"Fifth. That we do now express to the men of our State and Nation, who have already sacrified all to take up arms in the defense of our country and the principles of democracy, humanity, and justice, our highest admiration and respect.

"Sixth. That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the journal of this senate; that a copy be furnished to the President of the United States; and a copy to the press."

Mr. JAMES. I have received petitions signed by a large number of citizens of Montgomery County and Allen County, in the State of Kentucky, praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, in order that the women of the United States may become the political equals of those of Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and the Scandinavian countries. I ask that the petitions be received and lie on the table, the joint resolution having been reported from the committee and is now on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will lie on the table.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate:

During the mass meeting of the Lithuanian people in Chicago, Ill., held January 1, 1918, under the auspices of the Lithuanian national fund, after the addresses made by Dr. J. J. Bielskis, Lithuanian representative at Washington, D. C.; Rev. Vaiciunas, rector of St. George's Parish; Rev. Kemesis and Mr. Zoldakas, editors of the Lithuanian Daily Draugas, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas the aggression and outrages of the autocracy against liberty of the people forced the United States to take arms to defend the peoples' rights on land and sea;

"Whereas the United States, being morally, physically, and materially one of the most powerful countries, is able of accomplishing great things in this undertaking;

"Whereas during this war small nations in Europe have suffered the most and some of the countries have been entirely devastated by ruthless militarism;

"Whereas Lithuania, on the eastern battle front, has for three years served as a battle field, having contributed also half a million of her sons for the allied armies, taking thereby an active part in the war for liberty and justice;

"Whereas the much appreciated words of President Wilson in the recent note to Russia, and also the proclaimed principle of nationalities by the allies, assure restoration of political liberty to the smaller nations;

"Whereas the claims of the nations could be considered as just only when they are presented to the peace congress by the authorized representatives of those nations: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the Lithuanians of the State of Illinois, having migrated from our native land of Lithuania to this land of liberty, and ever pledging our loyalty to this, our adopted country, sincerely believing in and living up to the principles of the United States of America, being nevertheless in sympathy with our brethren in Lithuania bearing the heavy yoke of autocracy:

"1. We appeal to the Congress of the United States, through the representatives of our State, that the Congress of the United States, in discussing peace terms, include the demand for the restoration of the political independence of Lithuania.

"2. That the Government of the United States support the rights of all nations participating or affected in this war, be they large or small.

"3. That these rights can only be satisfactorily supported by considering just claims when presented by the representatives of such nations.

"4. We earnestly pray and implore the representatives of our State in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress to bring to pass the above measure.

"Be it further

"Resolved, That Dr. J. J. Bielskis be, and he hereby is, empowered and instructed to present a copy of these resolutions to the representatives of the State of Illinois in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress at Washington, D. C."

PROPOSED RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I send to the desk a telegram, addressed to the Vice President, which has been handed to me and which I desire to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

TRENTON, N. J., January 7, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL:

As president of Council of States on Taxation, I respectfully draw your attention to the importance that any congressional action re governmental railroad control does not interfere with existing methods or privileges of individual States and local units of taxation on railroads, property or receipts, at the present time. This, in many States, constitutes a large portion of State revenue, and to amend in any form would greatly embarrass many States, necessitating new methods of taxation, which at this time would be most burdensome and unfortunate.

WALTER E. EDGE, Governor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in connection with the communication just read, I desire to ask that the bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] upon this subject be printed in full in the RECORD. I know it was his purpose to ask that that be done, but it seems not to have been printed. There is a desire from all over the United States for copies of the bill, and I think printing in the RECORD would afford the best opportunity for general familiarity with it, and it will also make it easy for us to telegraph inquirers who desire to see it that by turning to a certain number of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD they can find it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill, introduced by Mr. SMITH of South Carolina January 4, 1918, is as follows:

A bill (S. 3385) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President, having in a time of war taken over the possession, use, and control (called herein Federal control) of certain systems of transportation (called herein carriers) is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as its just compensation an income at an annual rate equivalent as nearly as may be to its average net railway operating income for the three years ending June 30, 1917 (called herein standard return); said net railway operating income for the purposes of this act shall, as to carriers making returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission, be computed from such returns, excluding, however, debits and credits arising from the accounts called in the monthly returns leased road rents and miscellaneous rents: Provided, however, That no Federal taxes in excess of taxes assessed during the year ending June 30, 1917, shall be charged against revenue in computing such standard return. Any net railway operating income in excess of such standard return shall be the property of the United States. The amount of such standard return as accruing during said period of three years shall be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the certificate of said commission as to the amount of said net railway operating income shall, for the purpose of such agreement and guaranty, be taken as final and conclusive.

During the period of such Federal control adequate depreciation and maintenance of the properties of the carriers shall be included as a part of the operating expenses or provided through a reserve fund, in accordance with such principles and rules as shall be determined by the President.

SEC. 2. That if no such agreement is made, the President may nevertheless pay or cause to be paid to any carrier while under Federal control an amount not exceeding 90 per cent of such standard return, remitting such carrier to its legal rights in the Court of Claims for any balance claimed; and any amount thereafter found due above the amount paid shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum; and any excess amount paid hereunder shall be recoverable by the United States, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum.

SEC. 3. That any claim for just compensation not adjusted as provided in section 1 shall be submitted to a board of three auditors appointed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, members of which and of the official force thereof being eligible for service as such auditors, but without additional compensation therefor. Said auditors shall give a full hearing to such carrier and to the United States and shall report to the President the amount due such carrier as just compensation; a sum not exceeding the amount so reported may be agreed upon by the President and such carrier. Failing such an agreement, either the United States or such carrier may file a petition in the Court of Claims for the purpose of final ascertainment of the amount of such just compensation, and in the proceedings in said court the report of said auditors shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated. The just compensation of any carrier under Federal control not making returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of this section.

SEC. 4. That the return of any carrier shall be increased by an amount reckoned at a rate per centum to be fixed by the President upon the cost of any additions and improvements made while under Federal control with the approval of the President to the property of any carrier and paid for by such carrier from its own capital or surplus; and by an amount equal to the rate accruing to the United States upon any advances made to such carrier for the cost of such additions and improvements as provided in section 6 hereof.

SEC. 5. That no carrier while under Federal control shall, without the prior approval of the President, declare or pay any dividend in excess of its regular rate of dividends during the three years ending June 30, 1917: Provided, however, That such carriers as have paid no regular dividends or no dividends during said period, may, with the prior approval of the President, pay dividends at such rate as the President may determine.

SEC. 6. That the sum of $500,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of the Public Treasury from any funds not otherwise appropriated, which, together with any funds available from any excess earnings of said carriers, may be used by the President as a revolving fund for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Federal control, and any deficit of any carrier below such standard or ascertained return, and to provide terminals, improvements, engines, rolling stock, and other necessary equipment, such terminals, improvements, and equipment to be used and accounted for as the President may direct, and to be disposed of as Congress may hereafter by law provide.

The President may also, on or in connection with the property of any carrier, make or order any carrier to make any additions and improvements necessary or desirable for war purposes or in the public interest. He may from said revolving fund advance to such carrier all or any part of the expense of such additions and improvements so ordered and constructed by such carrier or by the President, such advances to be charged against such carrier and to bear interest at such rate and be payable on such terms as may be determined by the President, to the end that the United States may be fully reimbursed for any sums so advanced.

Any loss claimed to accrue to any carrier by reason of any such additions or improvements so ordered and constructed may be determined by agreement between the President and such carrier; failing such agreement the amount of such loss shall be ascertained as provided in section 3 hereof.

From said revolving fund the President may expend such an amount as he may deem necessary or desirable for the purchase, construction, or utilization, and operation of boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities on the inland and coastwise waterways, and may in the acquisition, operation, and use of such facilities create or employ such agencies and enter into such contracts and agreements as he shall deem in the public interest.

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of providing funds requisite for maturing obligations or for other legal and proper expenditures, or for reorganizing railroads in receivership, carriers may, during the period of Federal control, issue such bonds, notes, equipment trust certificates, stock and other forms of securities, secured or unsecured by mortgage, as the President may approve as consistent with the public interest. The President may purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and may sell such securities whenever in his judgment it is desirable at prices not less than the cost thereof; any sums available from the revolving fund provided in section 6 may be used for such purchases.

SEC. 8. That the President may execute any of the powers herein and heretofore granted him with relation to Federal control through such agencies as he may determine, and may fix the reasonable compensation for the performance of services in connection therewith; and may utilize the personnel and facilities of the Interstate Commerce Commission and call upon members of such commission, or any of its employees, or employees of any department of the Government for such services as he may deem expedient. No such Federal official or employee shall receive any additional compensation for such services.

SEC. 9. That the President is hereby authorized while carriers are under Federal control, to direct that the Federal workmen's compensation act of September, 1916, shall be extended so as to apply to carrier employees, on such terms and conditions as will give due consideration to remedies available under State compensation laws or otherwise.

SEC. 10. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President to take possession and assume control of any or all systems of transportation; and the President, in addition to the powers conferred by this act, shall have, and is hereby given, such other and further powers necessary or appropriate to give effect to the powers herein and heretofore conferred.

SEC. 11. That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith, or with the provisions of this act, or any other act applicable to such Federal control, or with any order of the President, be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers; and suits may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law: Provided, however, That except with the written assent of the President no attachment shall be levied by mesne process or on execution on or against any of the property used by any such carrier in the performance of its duties as a common carrier.

SEC. 12. That every person or corporation, whether carrier or shipper, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by a carrier or shipper, or other person, who shall knowingly violate or fail to observe any of the provisions of this act, or shall knowingly interfere with or impede the possession, use, operation, or control of any railroad property, railroad, or transportation system hitherto or hereafter taken over by the President, or shall violate any of the provisions of any order or regulation made in pursuance of this act, or of any other act concerning such possession, use, operation, or control, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or, if a person, by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. Each independent transaction constituting a violation of, or a failure to observe, any of the provisions of this act, or any order entered in pursuance hereof, shall constitute a separate offense. For the taking or conversion to his own use or the embezzlement of money or property derived from or used in connection with the possession, use, or operation of said railroads or transportation systems, the criminal statutes of the United States, as well as the criminal statutes of the various States where applicable, shall apply to all officers, agents, and employees engaged in said railroad and transportation service while the same is under Federal control, to the same extent as to persons employed in the regular service of the United States. Prosecutions for violations of this act or of any order entered hereunder, shall be in the district courts of the United States, under the direction of the Attorney General, in accordance with the procedure for the collection and imposing of fines and penalties now existing in said courts.

SEC. 13. That the Federal control of transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue for and during the period of the war and until Congress shall thereafter order otherwise.

NAVAL OIL SUPPLY.

Mr. SWANSON. I introduce a bill to further provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States with respect to the production, use, and conservation of oil and gas in naval petroleum reserves, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to the bill being referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hardwick	McLean	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hitchcock	McNary	Smoot
Calder	James	Martin	Stone
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Sutherland
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Swanson
Fernald	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Thomas
Fletcher	Kenyon	Poindexter	Tillman
Frelinghuysen	King	Robinson	Townsend
Gallinger	Knox	Saulsbury	Trammell
Gerry	La Follette	Shafroth	Vardaman
Gronna	Lewis	Sheppard	Williams
Hale	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to state that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is unavoidably absent owing to illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] is detained on important public business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], is detained on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SWANSON. I have made a motion that the bill I introduce be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is a bill to permit the Government to operate for oil the naval reserve lands that have been set aside for that purpose. I will state in this connection that the lands were withdrawn from public entry and taken out of the public domain.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the bill been read to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been introduced by the Senator from Virginia and a motion made to refer it to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. THOMAS. When it is reported at the desk I desire to object under the rule to its consideration to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer it to the committee.

Mr. SWANSON. I make that motion.

Mr. THOMAS. Under Rule XIV—

Whenever a bill or joint resolution shall be offered, its introduction shall, if objected to, be postponed for one day.

My reason for making the objection is that when we adjourned yesterday it was understood that two arguments, or perhaps three, would be offered upon the unfinished business to-day, provided that the chairman of the Committee on Printing would consent to its withdrawal at that time. This motion is going to involve a great deal of controversy, and if it comes on to-day it will be impossible to carry out the understanding with regard to the proceeding upon the pending business. Therefore, under Rule XIV, I object to its introduction to-day and ask that it go over.

Mr. SWANSON. It must go over under the rule, if objection is made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over for one day.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SWANSON. I make the request that it be printed and come up to-morrow.

Mr. TILLMAN. Printed in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to know whether the request is that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SWANSON. I did not make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Do I understand that there was a request that the bill be printed in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was none.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There would be no use to print it in the RECORD.

THE PHILIPPINE SCOUTS.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2933) for the relief of the Philippine Scouts, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 180), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for books and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a price not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before the said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate; and the expense thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

THE PRESIDENT'S PEACE POLICY.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender a resolution and ask that it be read and lie on the table after reading, not to be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 181), as follows:

Whereas the Senators of the United States Senate, anxious for a just peace between the contending nations now at war in Europe, and also for peace between the United States and the world, and particularly between the United States and the German Empire; and

Whereas the Senate is advised as to the terms which have been stated and expressed to the Congress of the United States by the President of the United States, upon which the United States recommends peace: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That for the purpose of aiding the peace of all belligerents the Senate approves the course of the President of the United States in presenting with definiteness and in detail the terms upon which peace could be had; and

Resolved further, That the Senate approves the statement of the President as presented by him in his message to Congress of January 9, 1918; and

Resolved further, That the Senate will cooperate with the President in every way consistent with its duty to the public to obtain the acceptance of the terms presented by the President, or such other terms as will serve the objects set forth by the President, as will bring peace consistent with the welfare of the United States and justice to the contending parties.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask that the resolution for the present lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That action will be taken.

CONSIDERATION OF TREATIES.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that Senate resolution 178, coming over from yesterday, be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. BORAH on the 9th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and the same is hereby, directed to prepare a revision of the rules of the Senate relating to the consideration of treaties so as to provide that all treaties hereafter shall be considered in the open executive sessions of the Senate, and, when such revision is so prepared, to report the same to the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss this matter; particularly, I have no desire to discuss the merits of the proposed change in the rules. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], however, has raised a point of order upon which, if he desires to press it, I may have something to say.

Mr. STONE. What is the point of order?

Mr. BORAH. The point of order was that I had not proceeded to amend the rules in accordance with the rules; that I should have given notice, and so forth. My contention is that this procedure does not come under the provision of the Senate rules at all; but I do not know whether or not the Senator desires to press the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I did not formally make the point of order; I suggested the point of order after objection had been made to the immediate consideration of the resolution, and it went over.

I myself do not believe that the Senator has followed the mode provided by the rules for amending the rules. I think that Rule XL clearly contemplates a written notice pointing out the rule to be changed and specifying the exact change that is to be made, which must lie over a day. Then I think the rule contemplates the formal presentation from the floor of the proposed changes. It is, however, true that the Senate has had this subject up several times. It has been ruled by the Senate that the presentation of an amendment to the rules without notice, if it lie over a day, is a compliance with the rule; it has also been held by the Senate that such a course was not a compliance with the rule.

My real objection, not so much to this particular resolution, but generally, is that I should vastly prefer that a Senator who wanted something done should himself prepare it than that he should by resolution call upon a committee on which I am serving to prepare it for him.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I shall be very glad if this resolution goes to the committee to prepare what I consider ought to be the revision of the rule, and submit it to the committee for its consideration and report. I will take upon myself, as I am the mover of the resolution, to do the work, and I hope that when it is done it will be satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, the committee, no doubt, could report favorably or unfavorably upon it.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand that the resolution commits the committee as to what report it shall make upon the subject, but that it only requires the committee to prepare an amendment to the rules for the Senator from Idaho. It provides that the Rules Committee shall prepare an amendment to the rules along the lines that he desires to be considered and to report it to the Senate, favorably or unfavorably. I know the Senator from Idaho can prepare it certainly as well as can the committee, and I do not understand why he failed himself to prepare and present it in the usual way. With this statement, so far as I am concerned, I do not object.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Georgia that under this resolution the committee can report it unfavorably. The committee is "directed to prepare a revision of the rules of the Senate relating to the consideration of treaties, so as to provide that all treaties hereafter shall be considered in open executive sessions of the Senate, and when such revision is so prepared, to report the same to the Senate for its consideration."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The resolution does not say "report it favorably."

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We can prepare it and present it with an unfavorable report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I differ from the Senator in that, because, to my mind, it is a specific direction to the committee to prepare a certain thing and to report it to the Senate. If it is to be reported adversely, it is not providing for a change of the rules of the Senate so as to have treaties considered in open executive session at all. I really think, as first suggested by the Senator from Georgia, that the Senator from Idaho, who is greatly interested in this matter, should himself prepare whatever he has in mind and submit it to the committee for its consideration, or ask for its immediate consideration by the Senate. I very likely would not agree favorably to report a resolution providing that all treaties should be considered in open executive session, and yet I am commanded by this resolution to agree with other members of the committee to make such a report. I think the resolution is unfortunately worded.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this resolution does not, in my judgment, with all respect to the Senator's opinion, do anything of the kind. It was specifically drawn so as not to do anything of that kind. I desire to bring before the Senate a report of the committee revising the rules, without asking for a commitment from the committee as to whether it was favorable or unfavorable. I specifically state that after the report is made providing for these changes that it is to be reported to the Senate for its consideration. I do not understand at all that that would necessitate the Senator from New Hampshire coinciding with my view of the matter in order to make this revision and report it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I still hold to that view, and I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules for its consideration.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, just a word. I suppose, of course, that this resolution will go to the Committee on Rules——

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. As it concerns a rule for the government of the body. But it also concerns, in a very serious and far-reaching way, the diplomatic relations between this country and other countries as related to treaties. I am not clear how to get at it, but I believe whenever the Committee on Rules reports, if it reports a rule of this general kind suggested, I shall move that in some way it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations for consideration there and a report upon the wisdom or expediency of the change in the rules so as to provide for the consideration of all treaties in the open sessions of the Senate.

I wish merely to make the suggestion that it seems to me, in a matter of such grave consequence, which involves such a wide departure from the course that has been followed in our whole history, it at least in some way ought to have the authoritative consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when the committee reports back the provision, the Senator would doubtless move to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I do not know that I would object to have it so considered before final action by the Senate. What I desire now is to get a report before the Senate for its consideration. Whether to adopt it or refer it to the Foreign Relations Committee will be determined at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, if this resolution goes to the Committee on Rules, as similar resolutions usually do, the committee will then take it up and make a report on the resolution. There is no doubt that we will get a report one way or another. I think it ought to go to the committee, and I think the Senator ought to agree to that.

Mr. BORAH. I am sending it to the committee, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no; the Senator is sending it to the committee with directions.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not move to strike out anything in the resolution, does he?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but I want the committee to consider the resolution in its present form, without any direction on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to submit to a ruling of the Chair upon the point of order, if any has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no point of order made, according to the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. Then I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to refer the pending resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BORAH. Now, Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose the resolution is referred to the Committee on Rules, what will be the difference in its status than if it were adopted by the Senate directing the committee to report?

Mr. KENYON. It would be buried.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The committee might use its discretion in regard to its action.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would not go to the committee with a direction; it would go there for its consideration.

Mr. BORAH. If that is the program, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I call for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll, the absence of a quorum being suggested.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smoot
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Stone
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Swanson
Calder	Kenyon	Phelan	Thomas
Culberson	King	Poindexter	Tillman
Curtis	Kirby	Ransdell	Townsend
Fernald	Knox	Robinson	Trammell
France	La Follette	Saulsbury	Underwood
Gallinger	Lewis	Shafroth	Vardaman
Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard	Warren
Hale	McKellar	Sherman	Watson
Harding	McLean	Simmons	Williams
Hardwick	McNary	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott
James	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smith, S. C.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], is detained on account of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is detained on official business.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WALSH] is still necessarily detained from the Senate by illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee be allowed to sit in committee during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is another matter before the Senate now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from South Carolina is for unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object until the pending matter is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I withdraw my motion, and submit the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Idaho. I feel assured there will be no objection on the part of the Senator himself to the proposed substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Idaho.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the resolution submitted by Mr. BORAH, Mr. GALLINGER submits the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and the same is hereby, directed to consider the advisability of preparing a revision of the rules of the Senate relating to the consideration of treaties, with a view to providing that all treaties hereafter shall be considered in the open executive sessions of the Senate, report to be made to the Senate at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand that the mover of the resolution accepts the substitute?

Mr. BORAH. I think I shall, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire as a substitute for the original resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

COST OF OFFICERS' UNIFORMS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, before the morning business is closed I desire to refer for a moment to the bill which I introduced a few days ago providing that the uniforms of officers of the Army should be furnished to them by the Government. I have a letter from the Secretary of War in answer to one which I wrote December 26 relating to this matter, in which he says:

Army regulations provide for sales only when supplies are not required for issue to enlisted men, and it has been necessary to apply these regulations very rigidly, owing to the present difficulty of procuring clothing and equipage for enlisted men. Sales of clothing and equipage supplies to officers have therefore been temporarily suspended.

A board of officers of which Gen. Baker is president is now considering this question with a view to establishment of purchases either through post exchanges or cooperative stores.

Mr. President, I do not claim to know very much about this matter, but it does occur to me that the simple, proper, and direct course for the Government to take would be to put itself in a position where it can take all this material that is available. Apparently, there is an abundance of material in private establishments for furnishing these uniforms. The Government can commandeer that and take it, and if the Government would arrange to deal with the wholesale manufacturers of these goods it would have on hand all the time ample supplies to furnish the officers with the goods at wholesale or cost prices, just as it furnishes the goods for the private soldiers.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Since the Senator has studied this matter, I should like to know his judgment about this point: Is it necessary to have additional legislation in order to give the Quartermaster Department of the Army authority to commandeer this stuff and to sell it at cost to the officers the same as it does to the private soldiers?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I doubt if it is necessary, but I will say to the Senator that I have not investigated that feature of the matter very fully. I have understood that the officers were required to buy all their uniforms.

Mr. NORRIS. I know they are.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But I see here, according to this letter of the Secretary, that apparently they have a regulation under which the officers can purchase uniforms from the Government, but that that has been suspended because of the inability of the department to get supplies. Now, if they need any authority to commandeer this stuff they ought to have it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then what does the suspension of this order mean? I take it, from the very fact that they have suspended an order that seems to have given them the authority to supply uniforms to these officers, that they must have the authority under existing law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They may have the authority to supply it, but not the authority to commandeer the stocks.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh!

Mr. JONES of Washington. I judge from the suspension of this regulation that they have not the authority to commandeer the stock and get control of it; so, not being able to supply both officers and men, they have suspended that regulation.

Mr. NORRIS. How do they get the men's clothing?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We make an appropriation directly for the supply for the private soldiers. I do not think we do for the officers. I think that is what we ought to do, however.

Mr. NORRIS. That may explain it; but if that is true probably the only thing necessary is for us to make an appropriation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. An ample appropriation—I think so.

Mr. WARREN rose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Wyoming probably can give us the facts more accurately.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Washington if there is any complaint on the part of the officers themselves in regard to this matter?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes. I made some statements on that subject here the other day about the outrageous prices they are having to pay for their uniforms.

Mr. WARREN. I did not hear them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say that this morning I got a letter from an officer stating that he had to pay $18 or $20 for a pair of breeches.

Mr. WARREN. There never has been any particular attention paid by the Government to the purchase of clothing and equipment by the officers, provided the uniforms were according to regulations, because that is their own matter; but the Government has usually held itself in readiness to sell to officers or men any of the equipment that it had at cost, or perhaps cost, plus a small margin to cover contingencies.

Mr. NORRIS. They have not been doing that lately.

Mr. WARREN. That may be, while they are furnishing the men, because in the case of the enlisted men clothing is a part of their compensation. The Government is under obligation to furnish that.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. The officers, on the other hand, take their own responsibility as to clothing, and always have done so; and very seldom in this part of the country have they bought of the Government. They usually buy directly from the different tailors, as civilians do.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, it is necessary for these officers to buy from private parties if the Government will not sell to them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is shown by the letter from the Secretary.

Mr. NORRIS. That is shown not only by the letter but by many other complaints.

Mr. WARREN. It does not require any new legislation, unless the Senator expects the Government to furnish free the uniforms to the officers. I saw some notice in the paper of the introduction of a bill on that subject. That, of course, would require legislation; but in my judgment no legislation is necessary about selling them the material, and I think there will be no hesitancy about selling it just as soon as this particular crisis is past, when they once get the private soldiers uniformed.

Mr. NORRIS. By that time the officers also will have purchased all their uniforms and that will not be of much value to them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the profiteers will have gotten their profit.

Mr. NORRIS. The profiteers will have reaped all the benefit and supplied them with the clothing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think there will be very few officers who, after examining the cloth that is furnished by our Government now for overcoats for the soldiers, will ask to have the privilege of buying that class of cloth. I consider it a very, very poor product and I do not believe many officers are going to buy that kind of cloth. I have noticed that the overcoats for officers are made of cloth that must have come from some different mill, or, if from the same mill, that is made entirely differently from the cloth that is made into overcoats worn by private soldiers. The officers' cloth is worth twice as much as that worn by the privates. It is made of the very finest of wool. It is finished as the overcoats used to be finished, whereas the overcoating that is worn by the privates—and I have examined many of them—is loaded with shoddy just as much as it is possible to load a thread and make it so that it will hold to be woven into cloth.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator think that ought to be permitted?

Mr. SMOOT. That can not be regulated by law. The only thing I am calling attention to is that regardless of any law we pass now, I do not believe that the officers of the United States would buy that kind of cloth for an overcoat.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is a provision in the bill I have introduced that the quality of these uniforms shall be prescribed by the department, and that the quality for all officers of the same rank shall be exactly the same. I would not permit an officer of the Army to have any say about the character of the uniform that he shall wear. We should direct that every officer of the same rank shall wear the same sort of uniform, just as we require privates to wear the same sort of uniform. Let us prescribe what the uniform of a colonel shall be, what the uniform of a major shall be, what the uniform of brigadier shall be, and not have it so that because one officer is wealthy he can have a uniform of a certain quality and of a certain peculiar fitness while the man who does not happen to be in the ranks of the millionaires must be satisfied, although he has the same rank, with a different kind of uniform. I take it that we can require that by law, and that the Secretary of War can prescribe regulations under which these uniforms can be properly provided.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The uniform regulations already provide the kind of uniforms the officers shall wear. If they want to get all-wool cloth, or cloth that contains perhaps 10 per cent of reworked wool, undoubtedly they can do that; but as to the cut, color, and style, the law, or rather the regulations, provide what that shall be. The officers, however, have the purchases to make themselves, and if they choose they can have all wool in the goods instead of the regulation material.

Speaking of the kind of uniforms that the enlisted men wear, the evidence that is being taken in another place shows exactly the make. The standard when the war broke out permitted a small percentage of cotton in the cloth, the balance to be of virgin wool. It was found that that did not have the warmth necessary for the cold country. Of course, cotton does not give the warmth that wool does, and so it was changed to have, say, 20 per cent reworked wool and 80 per cent virgin wool. As the stress of obtaining the right kind of wool for these uniforms was on, which requires the quarter-blood grade and possibly three-eighths grade at times, they changed the standard to, I think, as much as 35 or 40 per cent reworked wool, and the balance virgin wool; so it is all wool, although part of it is reworked.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to ask the Senator if he means, by "reworked wool," shoddy?

Mr. WARREN. It means the cuttings from the making of suits, and so forth. All of the off-fall is the reworked wool. Of course, we all use the name "shoddy" as applying to that as well as to other classes of material, but shoddy proper, which meets the opprobrium of everyone, is quite a different substance. It is that which has been reworked, and again and again reworked, and ground up, and so forth.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS I have not attended the hearings to which the Senator refers, but I have read accounts of them in the newspapers, and I understand that the admission was made before the committee that shoddy was substituted for the cotton, and later on that a further reduction of the wool was made, so that the proportions are now 50 per cent wool and 50 per cent shoddy. I for one think it is an outrage that our soldiers should be clothed in that way.

Mr. WARREN. I do not believe there has been quite that percentage of shoddy. I agree with the Senator that all-virgin wool should be what we finally aim at. I should prefer to see the clothing all wool, and perhaps that will soon be brought about.

Mr. CURTIS. That is what should be brought about.

Mr. WARREN. But in the haste of supplying a million men the use of shoddy or reworked wool has crept in, and, of course, we submit to it for the time being; but undoubtedly it must have been and is the intention, and undoubtedly it will be brought about—it certainly will if the committee that is hearing this testimony has anything to do about it—that the clothing eventually will be all wool.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Wyoming comes from the sheep country and is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. Is it true, as reported in the papers, that the Secretary of War testified before that committee that some time last spring, after our declaration of war, the Western Wool Growers' Association offered to sell their entire wool output to the Government at such a price as the Government might fix, and that the Secretary of War testified that no action was taken on that offer, but that it was referred to some one, and from that person to some one else, and he did not know what was finally done about it? Is that correct?

Mr. WARREN. Not exactly that way. Since the Senator has asked the question, I will say——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to add that the reason I ask the question is on account of the debate here this morning as to whether or not there is enough wool in the country to make uniforms for the soldiers and for the officers. I am very much in sympathy with the bill which has been introduced by my colleague; but if there is a shortage of wool, necessitating the use of reworked wool, or even of shoddy, which some of the subcommittees of the Council of National Defense have resorted to, we can readily understand why that would be the case if the offer of the wool people of the country was ignored when they offered to sell wool to the Government at such a price as the Government might fix.

Mr. WARREN. On the 2d or 3d day of April last the wool trade of Boston offered the Government one-half of the wool that they had on hand at the market price of that date, they believing—which was perfectly apparent to everybody—that wool must rise. That offer was considered to some extent by the Government, but there was nothing shown in the evidence as to just what action, if any, was taken on it. Later, about July, the offer was again made, and the representatives of the wool trade came over here, and they were referred to the committee on purchases, and to the particular branch of the committee that had charge of the purchases of raw material; and the answer was given at that time that there was no law for it. In the first instance, I think, the answer was that there had been no appropriation made for it.

A little later on, or about that time, representatives, not of the associated woolgrowers altogether but of those that have their headquarters in Chicago and have their large warehouses there, sent a committee here, and it met the purchase of raw materials committee, which was presided over by Mr. Baruch, and offered the wool committee its wool at any price that the Government would make, taking into consideration, of course, the then market price. The same answer was given them; but about that time, or soon afterwards—the appropriations having in the meantime become effective—the Government decided that it could buy wool, and the Navy started in first to buy it, and later the Army; so that is the story of that.

A telegram from Mr. Hagenbarth, who is the president of the National Wool Growers' Association, received within a week, gave the quantity of available wool of the world, as the association was informed, and made the statement that there was enough to provide all wools, and that it was unnecessary to use substitutes; that there was enough to provide the Army with a certain number of pounds per annum per man, which was considered the necessary equipment. But, of course, that statement did not provide for the civilian market, nor did it state what would be the fact, that to use certain grades of that wool, the finer grades, would be more expensive; but he maintained that there was enough wool in the country to clothe every soldier so far with all-woolen goods.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have been led to wonder whether or not the fact that we happen to have so much cloth for so many officers of the Army, and that their being supplied rests very largely with the private concerns of the country, has not had a good deal to do with the fact that a good deal of shoddy is being used for the private soldiers? Is it not partly due to the fact that they have been using wool to make these fine uniform cloths for the officers?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is nothing in that. The proportion of that is entirely too small. They may be taking advantage in the price, but the wool used in the officers' clothes would have a very slight effect upon the vast amount which is used for private soldiers. I do not believe there is anything in that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not followed this matter very closely; but in conversation with a member of the Committee on Military Affairs last evening he presented some very startling facts as developed in the hearings of the last two or three days on this question of shoddy. His statements certainly surprised me very greatly, and if there is not great haste required in the consideration of this matter I think the Senator might well have that testimony transcribed, if it has not been printed, for the information of the Senate. I will say to the Senator frankly that the statements made by that member of the committee will, I think, astonish every Member of this body if they are presented to him.

Mr. WARREN. I will say that that evidence was given in extenso, and is only being printed confidentially for the committee, and I think it is not in type yet; but it covers every angle and every line of the making of the cloth and the production of clothing. Very little has been testified about the wool growing of the world, of course, because that was not called out. The balance of it is very elaborate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask the Senator if he considers that information that ought to be kept confidential?

Mr. WARREN. I think it is not the intention to keep it confidential.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought the Senator said that it was being printed in confidence.

Mr. WARREN. It is, from day to day, because there are some matters that very likely the committee will think it is better to strike out, but nothing of this kind; only matters regarding our relations with other countries, and so forth.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; certainly.

Mr. WARREN. But I think it is the intention to have it all printed. That is my idea of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Without assuming to criticize the committee at all, the Members of the Senate outside of the committee are very anxious to get some of these reports. The presumption is that the facts stated in some of them may crystallize at some time or other into some kind of legislation in regard to these different matters. I presume there is very good reason for not hastening the printing of these hearings, but it is a great inconvenience to Members of the Senate who desire to keep in touch with the situation not to be able to have these hearings. I should like the Senator from Wyoming to carry to the committee the suggestion that we are very anxious to get them before we actually come to the consideration of those matters which grow out of the investigation, that some one ought to be put to work to revise them, if any are to be eliminated, so that that which is to be published may be published.

Mr. WARREN. I think that will follow. It looks now as if the committee is nearly closing the investigation, and as witnesses are revising their remarks, as they are doing right along, I think that will be very easily and soon accomplished.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming, and through him to the committee, that if the hearing is prolonged all matters that are not considered confidential ought to be printed from day to day. That course is being pursued by the Committee on Commerce that is investigating the work of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation; matters that are not considered confidential are printed within a day or two after the hearing is had.

I wish also to say that the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming as to the very small proportionate part of wool needed for officers' uniforms compared with that of privates confirms me in my belief that they ought to be furnished by the Government and that the Government can very well do it along with the facilities and means that it has for furnishing private soldiers with their uniforms.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator what is undoubtedly one of the reasons why the price of officers' uniforms has gone up. I understand that upward of 2,000 commissions have been issued to officers in the Quartermaster Department. Those officers are still at large and it takes a good deal to supply them with uniforms. That undoubtedly raises the market price of officers' uniforms.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have here a statement that I received. As a general rule I pay no attention to an anonymous communication, but sometimes they state facts that can be very easily verified, and give information that may be of importance. It contains some very interesting statements which I desire to read. It purports to come from a wholesale manufacturer of cloth for uniforms. His business is in New York and he gives some very interesting information with reference to the procedure in the city of New York under which officers there can get their uniforms much more cheaply than they do elsewhere. He says:

My attention has been called to an article in to-day's issue of the Daily News-Record, of New York, quoting you to the effect that officers are being overcharged for equipment by retailers, and particularly mentioning uniforms. As my firm is one of the leading manufacturers of the country making hand-tailored uniforms for officers, as well as clothing for civilian wear, for distribution through the retail [illegible], I am in position to know something regarding this matter that may be of interest to you and helpful in solving this problem.

That officers are being overcharged in many cases by retailers can not be denied, but in my opinion the question will by no means be solved when the Government undertakes to manufacture them, and for the following reasons:

With few exceptions, officers will not wear the grade of uniforms that are being made by the Government.

My bill takes care of that phase of the matter and requires officers to wear the uniforms prescribed by the regulations issued by the Secretary of War.

They require and insist upon high-grade fabrics, such as pure worsted serges, whipcords, etc., and they demand high-grade linings, such as alpaca, serge, or silk.

Some officers may do that, and the very fact that they do demand these things may compel officers who are not really able to buy them to try to do the same. It certainly is not conducive to a proper spirit in the Army for officers to be wearing one quality of uniform and officers of the same rank being forced by their means to wear a poorer quality or else be compelled to go beyond their means to keep up with officers in the same rank who are better able to pay for their uniforms.

They also demand a hand-tailored suit, as this is the only process of making and finishing which will produce the fit and style they want.

Officers are, for the most part, men who have worn the finer grades of civilian clothes—

I leave the rest of that paragraph—

It seems to me that the quartermaster depot of New York is handling this question in a very practical way. I am informed that they are supplying to all officers who call at the depot a list of names of some 20 or 30 manufacturers of officers' equipment, and have requested these manufacturers to supply them with a price list and to deliver equipment to officers individually and collect the wholesale price from the officers, thus saving the officers the retailers' expense of doing business plus the profit. As the expense of retailers vary from 20 to 30 per cent and their ideas of profit from 25 to 40 per cent, you can readily see the saving that the New York depot is effecting for these officers who call there for equipment.

I have been present on several occasions when officers called for uniforms, presenting this list from the New York depot, and have heard their expressions of surprise at the very large savings effected in the purchase of a blouse and breeches. Uniforms of fine quality of pure wool serge are thus obtained for $24 to $33. Prices varying according to the weight, linings, etc. In this case officers make their own alterations where necessary, just as they would have to do were they supplied by the Quartermaster Department.

These are the same uniforms being retailed throughout the country at $37.50 to $55 (in some cases as high as $65). These retail prices are beyond the control of manufacturers, as you can readily understand. May I suggest that it might be advisable for the Government to require all manufacturers of officers' equipment to file their price lists with the various depot quartermasters and to supply officers as they are now being supplied through the New York depot, or by mail.

Manufacturers would, as a patriotic duty, I am sure, be glad to render this service to the Government, although their prices are based on quantity production and handling, and it entails some extra expense to handle single garments.

If this request came from the depot quartermasters there could be no complaint on the part of the retailer to the manufacturer. Manufacturers are—

Here is rather a significant suggestion:

Manufacturers are reluctant to offer their goods to officers for fear of the loss of the retailers' trade. From observation I should say that very few officers know of this arrangement at the New York depot, as only those who call there are given this list of manufacturers.

Of course a plan followed something like that may be of benefit to the officers in localities where they have these manufactories, but there are a great many places in the country where officers must get their uniforms where these manufacturing establishments are not located. It is very significant that the wholesale manufacturers of cloth to be made into uniforms for officers of the country are afraid of disposing of it to officers individually, because of their fear of losing the trade of retailers, who seem to want to prey upon the patriotism of the men of the country who have offered their lives in its defense.

I ask that this communication may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I hope that something more than an investigation will be had with reference to the matter. It ought not to take very long to determine something as to what would be a wise course to take in regard to it. We are going to have to call for thousands more of officers from the homes of the country, and prompt and definite action should be taken by the committee if any legislation is necessary, and if no further legislation is necessary the department ought to adopt a definite and clear course and do it promptly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the communication will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The morning business is closed.

SUPPLY OF PRINT PAPER.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask that Senate joint resolution 101, the unfinished business, be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of paper at a fair price, and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the pending question is on the amendment offered by me, which I will say I submitted after conference with the Trade Commission. I should like to have a vote upon the pending question unless some Senator desires to be heard.

Mr. HARDING. I do not think it is necessary, Mr. President, for one who makes his livelihood in the newspaper business to disavow any selfish ends in taking for the moment the news-print manufacturing side of the pending question, nor do I think it is necessary to say that circumstances are rather lacking in the inspiration one ought to have to speak on a subject of the importance of this question, but I am resolved to say a few things, in my mind, for my own conscience sake, whether I influence any vote on the pending question or not.

I venture to make these remarks because as a small publisher I have been brought in contact with the news-print problem from which the publishers of the country have suffered notably during the last year. The cost of news print is not the only mounting expense in the newspaper publication business of these days. Congress has some knowledge that it has attempted, rather ineffectually I will admit, to add to the cost of newspapers and newspaper distribution. Everything that enters into the cost account of a newspaper office has mounted up. Notably the manufacture of printer's rollers, a very essential thing in the operation of a press, and without which no newspaper could be published, has more than doubled. The metal necessary for the operation of the linotype machine, without which no modern newspaper can be published, and the metals employed in the stereotyping department of any newspaper of any considerable importance have essentially doubled in price. There was some reference made day before yesterday to the cost of ink, which most publishers are ready to testify as essential, having doubled in price. Metal type, brass rules, all the requisites of a mechanical department, have mounted up astonishingly, and yet quite in accord with the mounting price of everything else in a business era of extravagant expenditure.

I do not know how anybody, whatever his personal prejudices may be, can expect a normal cost on anything when the Government has doubled, tripled, and quadrupled its expenditures, and we are living in a perfect saturnalia of extravagance and outlay. Not only have these things in the newspaper world advanced in cost but labor has advanced, not as it reasonably ought in comparison with other things, but in accordance with increases that have been acceptable to the unions throughout the land. Then, there is the question of fuel, of power, and the innumerable things that enter into the cost of the production of a newspaper.

In passing it will be appropriate to the immediate subject under consideration to state—and I suppose it has been called to the attention of the distinguished chairman who has the joint resolution in charge—that paper generally which is uninfluenced by the so-called Paper Trust, job printing and book paper and writing paper, which are quite without the domination of the combinations which have offended in the news-print world, have gone up from 50 to 100 per cent in cost and are entering into the making of the current prices in the printing world. All these things have come to the publisher and to the printer.

I think it is fair to say that in most instances the cost has been passed along. The large newspaper publisher, the publisher of the daily paper, in many instances, has doubled his circulation price. I think the rural publisher has not added so much to the cost of his subscription rate. In many cases the increased cost has been partially compensated, if not altogether so, in an increased toll on the advertiser. The advertising world has been familiar with the general advance in prices, and it is worth while saying that the business men, who are the larger advertisers, have been big enough to accept the situation and accept the added burden. I think it is too much to say that the increased cost has been handed along in every instance or completely covered, but there has been a fair adjustment of it, notwithstanding the extremely enormous addition to the cost of publishing in 1917.

I think a newspaper man who knows the business, who has the qualities of making a success, would very much prefer in the end to adjust his own affairs. I make bold to say at this time that I do not want the United States Government to furnish me my print paper. I want to emphasize the fact that as a Republican publisher in this era I do not want to subject myself to a Government control of my paper supply. I am not saying this in any ugly temper, but it is a fact that there is the tightest "little old" censorship of the press on in this country to-day that ever existed in the world. I voted for it and I suspect it is necessary, and I am willing to submit to it; but I am not going to be a publisher, while I can help it, and submit to the censorship on one hand and invite the Government control of my newspaper supply on the other. When I am obliged to do that I am going to join the party in power, which never forgets its partisan aspirations, no matter how much those of us on this side of the Chamber have been willing to submerge ours for the country's good. But that is quite apart from my immediate thought.

I know something about the news-print manufacturing business. I hope it is not necessary for me to say that I have neither an interest in it nor sympathy with the robbing methods that were employed by a great many large news-print manufacturers who took advantage of the war situation in this country last year, but as a buyer of news print I have experienced the varying market for a goodly number of years.

It may interest the Senator from Arizona to know that prior to the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, when we were suffering from alleged "high" prices incident to the economic policy in existence at that time, when there were ample news-print mills to meet the American demand, even so small a publisher as the company in which I am interested was able to buy its news print at $1.65 a hundred pounds. Suddenly the Spanish-American War created a great demand for news print. It is very easy to understand that war in itself brings no new emergency to the newspaper world, but the interest in war events makes an unusual demand for the perfectly useless extra editions of the papers. News-print prices in 1898 jumped from $1.65 a hundred to $3 and $4 without the slightest suggestion of a combination on the part of any of the manufacturers. It jumped because the suddenly increased demand created a panic on the part of those who were not covered in their supply by contracts, and they were obliged to enter the open or spot market and get their supply of paper at any price they could. So that sort of a situation advanced the price of news-print paper in 1898 to 3 and 4 cents per pound for the publisher whose supply had not been previously arranged for, and that sort of a market prevailed more or less until approximately a year after the war was ended. A very similar situation developed in 1917; it began in 1916.

There had previously been mounting costs in the production of news-print paper. I wonder if Senators have ever stopped to think that news-print paper is made principally from the spruce tree? We have almost denuded the American forests of spruce. One may go into Maine these days and travel over hundreds of miles where the forests have been denuded and the land, fortunately, turned into the culture of potatoes. We are getting our spruce nowadays, in the main, from Canada. Any man who has taken sufficient interest to go into the question of raw materials knows that unless we start a systematic reforestation of the spruce lands and cultivate spruce specifically for the production of paper we are going to have a famine in the original raw material which is necessary to the manufacture of news-print paper.

If it is not too much of a diversion at this point, I should like to say that the United States Government could do a far greater service for the newspapers of this country if it would give its attention to finding a substitute for the spruce trees than would be done by the passage of this legislation. One objection I have to paralyzing the production of news-print paper by Federal control is that it is going to hinder the application of American genius and American determination to find a basic source of supply for the manufacture of news-print paper. Do you suppose for a moment that any genius, that any student of this problem is going to bend his energies to such a development if he contemplates Government control of his industry? I do not. So news-print paper has been advancing in price continually because of the menace of a disappearing supply of raw material.

Quite apart from that, and properly I want to say, the cost of news-print paper was increased very largely in the last three or four years by a complete change of the labor situation. Five years ago there was scarcely a news-print paper factory in the United States that was not operating under what we call two shifts of 12 hours each. The manufacturers were persuaded by the working forces in their plants to adopt an 8-hour day and to change from two shifts of 12 hours each to three shifts of 8 hours each. It does not require very much knowledge of arithmetic to understand how much that added at one jump to the expense of paper production.

So, then, for two reasons we have had a mounting cost in the manufacture of news-print paper. As to the third reason, I am reluctant to enter into a discussion of that, because I would not for anything in the world offend the genial Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and I am not going to be foolish enough to attempt to interest anybody in the discussion of the political and economic side of this question; but it is a fact that the newspaper publication business in this country has far outstripped news-print paper production. That requires considerable discussion to get at the various reasons involved, but two principal reasons will offer the explanation. One was the perfection and the cheapening of the typesetting machines. Rural publishers who 20 years ago were content to send a little daily paper to press with five columns of news matter, which they had themselves set, now produce from 40 to 50 columns at little more outlay in the mechanical department; and with the improvement of the reading side of the paper they have added to their advertising account.

Papers which formerly were content to issue 8 pages now issue 16 pages. If one picks up a metropolitan paper, with which he will be familiar if he resorts to his memory, he will find that the publication which used to convey its advertising, its news, and its comments in 8, 12, or 16 pages now goes to press daily with 16, 24, 28, or 32 pages, while on Sunday—well, the average Sunday publication is so enormous that it baffles a reasonable description. All this consumes paper, and production in this country has not kept apace.

The newspaper men who might view an economic situation with a business eye would resolve to meet it with diminution of consumption. I think it is a pretty fair proposition that if there is an inadequate supply of anything in the world, if you will diminish the consumption you will adjust the situation; and the boys in the newspaper gallery can tell their publications, if they want to, that I said that there is not a newspaper in the United States of America that could not reduce its consumption of paper without taking anything away from its readers; but it has become the fashion in these United States to turn to the Government in every hour of grievance, and that is why I am talking for the moment in opposition to this joint resolution.

However, before I take up that phase of the question—meanwhile expressing my gratitude to the half dozen Senators who are good enough to sit here—I want to express a selfish reason for opposing this resolution. Perhaps some Senators will be interested in the news-print controversy. I think I know it. I do not think there is a news-print trust, I will say to the Senator from Arizona. At any rate, I never in my 30 years' experience as a publisher bought of the trust. I do know that there was a combination of large manufacturers last year, or the year before, to fix the price of news-print paper and the trade conditions under which it was sold. I think they violated the law; I think they ought to have been prosecuted; I think they ought to be brought to repentance; and I am glad there were efforts made in that direction. I quite agree with the Senator from Arizona that they robbed thousands of publishers of this country unreasonably and in an unforgivable manner. I think it is fair to say, however, in that connection—and I say it solely through a spirit of fairness—that the biggest robbers in the United States were not in the combination but were the men outside of it, who took advantage of the situation while proclaiming their independence. That is one of the inevitable things, however.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That condition will run along with a combination always.

Mr. HARDING. But this enormous robbery was made possible in 1917 by a perfect panic in the newspaper world incident to the increased demand for news print, and, without drifting into a discussion, which we will differ upon at the proper time, we have increased enormously our American consumption without keeping up our American production. Then when the strain came there was a panic to secure news-print supplies, and prices to those of the small publishing world who were not covered by contracts were immediately advanced in some cases to an enormous figure; and it was not infrequently the case that some of us who had only informal contracts found ourselves immediately obliged to go into the "spot market" and pay according to the figure prevailing at that time. Not only that, but it is fair to say that the panic in the newspaper market was so marked and so acute and the demand was so far in excess of the supply that many a publisher who was supposedly protected by a contract found himself driven to every extremity to get a sufficient supply of paper.

I think I heard the Senator from Arizona say the other day that the big and favored publishers were able to get all that they wanted, while the little publisher here and there was robbed enormously.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. "All they needed," I think I said.

Mr. HARDING. Well, "all they needed." I will accept the correction. The Senator is not well informed on that subject. I know many large publishers in this country whose supply of paper was amply covered by the most exacting contracts who were obliged to enter the open market and buy "spot" paper at 6 and 6½ cents a pound when their contracts provided that they should have paper at 2.10 cents a pound. That was not an uncommon experience. There are various explanations for it—mainly because the United States publishing world was in a perfect panic about the shortage of the news-print supply.

I will not say that the combination which was called to the bar of justice did not have something to do with that situation, because it undoubtedly did; but the Federal Trade Commission, either late in 1916 or early in 1917, contemplating an intolerable situation in this country, called in the representatives of the larger makers of news print and began an investigation of the situation, which long before the threat of prosecution by the Department of Justice, terminated in an arrangement whereby the large purchasers, the car-lot purchasers, of news print in rolls were to be supplied at the mills of this country at 2½ cents per pound. I think any newspaper man in the United States who is fair, who contemplates the diminishing spruce forests in this country and the increased cost of production, will agree that 2½ cents per pound is a fair price for news print, however much he might wish to buy it for less. The agreement was made with the manufacturers that they would turn their contracts over to the Federal Trade Commission and, no matter how much anyone was paying beyond that, he should have his supply as apportioned by the commission at the 2½-cent rate at the mill. There were other rates adjusted to that basic price for the small consumer.

That was a very happy arrangement, and I think the newspapers of the country were glad to applaud the making of it; but before it became effective the Department of Justice availed itself of the information which had been brought out in the investigation and secured indictments against a combination of a half-dozen or more large producers in this country. That, of course, disturbed the amity of the situation. I think I violate no confidence when I say that a number of publishers in this country, including some representatives of the publishing world from Capitol Hill, went before the Trade Commission and sought to have a suspension of the criminal prosecution because the thing accomplished under the friendly arrangement was of infinitely greater advantage to the publishing world than any punishment which could be meted out. Without criticizing—perhaps one can not justly criticize the Department of Justice—the department went on with its prosecution. That upset the friendly arrangement, and throughout 1917 every man sought paper to the best advantage he could and got it where he could. Of course, much of the output had already been covered by contracts, which nothing but a friendly arrangement could abrogate, and the little publisher, who has no more important business than that which I am interested in at home, found himself assessed anywhere from ten to twenty thousand dollars because of the increased cost of paper in 1917.

Having failed in relief because of the threat of prosecution the Federal Trade Commission very properly, I think, sought again to renew a friendly arrangement for the handling of the print supply of this country; and negotiations reached such a stage that the Department of Justice, on the recommendation of the Trade Commission, agreed to accept pleas of noncontention—nolo contendere, I think you lawyers call it—and the imposition of nominal fines which should end the criminal litigation, and the news-print producers of the country should enter into a voluntary arrangement with the Trade Commission as to fixing the price of paper. That arrangement was made. If I correctly understood the Senator from Arizona in his remarks the other day, he said that it was made, but that they were now trying to get away from it. Am I correct?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I said I thought I saw evidences of an effort to get away from it by a recent combination of the same men.

Mr. HARDING. That clears the situation and is in conformity with the information which I have.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to suggest to the Senator just at this point, merely explanatory of the Federal Trade Commission taking any hand at all in the matter, that the Senate itself started the investigation by a resolution directing the Federal Trade Commission to inquire into the price of this paper, and to make such recommendations as they saw fit.

Mr. HARDING. Yes; that is all quite true. This new arrangement—and I should like to have this very select company know about this——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if he yielded to me for the purpose of getting him a larger company?

Mr. HARDING. No; I would not wish that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator would not wish it?

Mr. HARDING. No; I am very particular. I rather relish the thought that at a time like this, when the American Republic is headed straight for a condition of State socialism, when we are seemingly doing everything in the world possible to paralyze individual initiative, when we are taking the Government of this Republic from the hands of the people and putting the people in the hands of the Government, when we are "hellbent" to the very condition that led Germany to bring on the war to save her from herself, and we have before us a measure so vital as this, relating to Government control of private industry, the Senate is so employed that there are six or seven of us present to discuss this great, vital problem!

Mr. President, I am not taking this extreme paucity of attention as a personal defect of mine, because it is characteristic of all the discussion that has been going on upon the floor of the Senate pertaining to these tremendously important questions; and I can hope for no great satisfaction, except that in the end I shall have put my warning into the records of this body, and the Nation that ultimately comes to repentance can read.

However, getting back to the problem in its practical phase, the Federal Trade Commission made an arrangement with the news-print producers of this country that beginning January 1, 1918, they would supply paper in rolls, carload lots, at the mill, at the basic price of 3 cents per pound, for a period of three months. I may say that that will save the average medium-sized publisher, if continued throughout the year, a sufficient cost on his paper product to pay a dividend on his capital. The arrangement further provided that after an experimental period of three months' control by the Trade Commission, a readjustment of price should be made after an ascertainment by the commission of the cost of production. Nobody disputes the arrangement. Nobody has proposed to abandon that arrangement; but the Senator from Arizona says he thinks he sees signs of trying to get away from it. I can tell you what the signs are; but, mark you, I hold no brief for the paper manufacturers. The signs are that the print-paper producers are gathering their forces to show what the cost of production is, and the newspaper men have been foolish enough to express the apprehension that the print manufacturers are going to produce a larger cost figure than anyone has been willing previously to believe. I want to say in this connection that if the Federal Trade Commission is so utterly incompetent, so utterly unworthy to pass upon a presentation of cost figures, then I do not want such an incompetent body to have control of the distribution of the print supply of this country.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me right there?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There will be no need of a Federal Trade Commission or anybody else to settle what the cost of print paper is if you will permit the same processes and the same morality to carry on the business of fixing what the cost is. There is no necessity for this investigation if you are limited to what they say, and if they combine now, as they did before, when they advertised to the world that they were going to raise the cost of paper, and notified each one of the manufacturers to make an extravagant return of costs so that they would be justified in increasing the price.

To answer further along the line of what the Senator has suggested as to this agreement, the agreement did fix the price of paper in rolls, carload lots, at the mill, at the price quoted.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator wants to make an answer to my statement, I much prefer that he shall do so later.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am not doing that. I am suggesting that the Senator did not do me justice in saying that I was contending against that and had nothing but a fear of a combination. That did not apply to the cut paper. It did not apply to any particle of paper except that in carload lots at the mill. If this joint resolution had nothing else to do except to attend to that, the Senator would not find me here advocating it.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator is mistaken. The agreement does apply to cut paper, but it does not provide for the same price for it, and here is the reason for that: I happen to have, in my capacity as a news-print buyer, a copy of the agreement made by the Federal Trade Commission with the manufacturers of this country, and I know what it contains. It does provide for a higher price for the cut paper, because there is more expense involved in preparing that paper for the market. The roll buyer gets his paper from the machine, turned out in the roll, and the moment it is wrapped it is ready for the car, for shipment. The buyer of cut paper must have that paper put through the process of cutting, packing, and counting into reams, which is a very different proposition; and the price is all accurately adjusted in this contract between the commission and the producer. I happen to have two contracts in my possession, though they are not before me just at this moment, which fix the agreement between the manufacturers and the Federal Trade Commission as the basis of our trade; and now I am going to utter my selfish reason for opposing this measure.

I do not want the United States Government to come in and again upset a friendly arrangement, with the result of increasing the cost of news-print paper to the consumers of this country. That is precisely what the prosecution did last year, though I am not attempting to criticize that action. The prosecution that was undertaken last year cost the newspaper publishers of this country not less than $5,000,000.

The Senator from Arizona misses one of the very essential points in this discussion. One news-print mill can produce paper at a cent a pound. I understand that there is one that produces it at a little less than a cent a pound. Another will produce it at a cent and a half a pound, and there may be scores of them that can not produce news print nowadays at less than 3 cents a pound. That is easy to explain. One large concern owns its own spruce forests, and it has an abundant supply of the raw material which it turns into sulphite pulp itself. It probably does it where it has an abundance of water power and cheap production. Another mill may be more or less antiquated. It may be four, five, or six hundred miles from the spruce forests. It may have no water power except during certain portions of the year, and in order to carry out its contracts for delivery it must grind and roll paper at certain seasons of the year with steam power.

You do not want any arrangement in this country, when there is a shortage of supply, that will cut out even the antiquated producer. That is where the Government made a very serious mistake in trying to control the fuel situation of the country. I voted for it, and I am glad we attempted to control the fuel situation, because that concerned the great masses of our people, and dealt in a large part with the distress of the people and the paralysis of necessary activities in this country. But the news-print situation does not involve such a question as that; and when the price of coal was fixed in this country the Fuel Administrator took no cognizance of the scalper, of the little producer who had gone in and added his thousands of tons of coal to the supply of this country, because prices were so high that he could profit through his crude processes. The price fixing shut him off, and immediately our supply was diminished by that much, when we ought really, for the country's good, to have had a variation in prices that would have permitted the little producer to continue his activities.

As a consumer of news-print paper anxious to see a sufficient supply to adjust the market in this country, I do not want a price that is going to shut down the mill that is producing by old-time methods. I do not want to shut down the mill that must buy its pulp from the pulp producer or its sulphite from the sulphite producer or must turn to steam power when its water supply fails. The only real way to adjust a price in the United States of America in time of peace or in time of war is to encourage a supply equal to the demand; and the trouble with this country is that we are trying to do these things by the artificial process of Government control, and it will prove the most miserable failure that was ever attempted by any civilized people.

I have said these things so far, Mr. President and the faithful, from the selfish viewpoint of the newspaper publisher. Now, let us for a moment ask ourselves where we are drifting.

Mr. President, I have voted for a good many measures in the last five months that were repugnant to my conception of governmental ideals. I have accepted the program of the administration almost without question, because I love my country far more than any political party; and I have assumed that the Executive, with complete knowledge of the situation, with facts I do not possess, knew infinitely better than I could hope to know what was required. I have been following along patriotically and blindly, accepting the call for legislation that has been proposed in the name of a war emergency. But I am resisting the passage of this measure because there is not a stretch of the imagination anywhere that will make this one a war-emergency measure.

The news-print situation is serious, to be sure, but a shortage would not seriously interfere with the Government's conduct of the war, because the most embarrassed agency in furthering the success of the Government in the war just now is the press of this country. It is true that we have not paralyzed it. The press, in the main, is loyal and wants to be helpful, but if you are going to conserve expenditure, if you are going to apply the Government-control policy, why not abandon the news associations that are spending their millions? Why not abolish the scores of special correspondents who are here at the expense of their publishers? Why not eliminate competition between newspapers in any given city and have one Government agency of publicity under the direction of Mr. Creel, of the department of publicity, and just tell the American people what the Government thinks it ought to know? Seriously, I tell you, we are on the verge now of being a people subject to the Government.

Mr. President, if you want to know the drift, there may be one illuminating fact. It is estimated that in the last 15 years the Government forces in Washington have increased by far more than 100 per cent. Suppose the population of the United States increased 1 per cent a year—you can make it larger if you like—then the population of this country will be increased 15 per cent in 15 years. So we are adding to the Federal forces engaged in Government work more than six times the addition to the population of the country. That applies only to the Federal Government, and we have only fairly begun in the establishment of bureaucracy in this land. Now, go a little further. We have followed the same inclination to put the people in the hands of the Government, rather than the Government in the hands of the people, except when we made a very miserable attempt at reformation, to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] referred the other day, in our primary system, to which is to be added the privilege of suffrage soon to come. In the States we have more than doubled the Government bureaus and Government agents controlling private affairs, and it does not end in the States. You can follow it to the municipality. In my State, where we have a basic limitation to the municipal tax rate, every great municipality in that State is facing a deficit in its financial affairs, and you can not raise money enough under the limitations to pay the expenses of municipal government. Where are we drifting?

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to state, in order to fortify his statement, that the same condition prevails in the municipalities of Illinois. Nearly all the taxes are levied under delegated powers and limitations of the constitution and the statutes of the State.

Mr. HARDING. I have no doubt that that is the case. It is the tendency throughout the country.

I am not sure, Mr. President, where I want to place the blame. When the German Kaiser decided to make war for the world's domination he cast a solvent into our present-day civilization that has put us in a very fluid state, and I am frank to say to the Members of the Senate who honor me with their hearing that I am a lot more concerned about the aftermath of the war than I am of the winning of it. Senators, if you go on adding to governmental control, and that is all this joint resolution is whatever else may be said about it, I want to hear from the genius who can offer a way to get back to normal conditions. I do not think we ever will. I think the sociological conditions of the past under which this American Republic was made, what we boast it to be, will never be reestablished. I am a good deal like the optimist who testified yesterday before the Senate Committee on Commerce. I am willing to take my chances in accordance with whatever conditions there are, with the sanction of the Government. But while I am willing to take my chances, and while I recognize the utter hopelessness of restoring the conditions of individualism under which we achieved as we have, nevertheless I think I should be remiss in my conscientious service as a public official if I did not cry out against a tendency which will ultimately put the bolsheviki in control of the United States.

Senators, I must allude to the Government assuming control of transportation, which would never have been necessary for a moment if we had allowed the railway managers of this country to do what the Government will now do on its own account. May I digress for a moment? There is nothing very pressing.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Nothing that I know of.

Mr. HARDING. In all, we have been very unthinking, and so unreasonable, so demagogic, if I may use the word, in dealing with the railroad problem. Out in my State, when I was a member of the general assembly, I remember voting for a statute forbidding State lines paralleling, and in natural competition from ever entering into any combination or amalgamation. When we found ourselves out in Ohio distressed by the fuel situation, as every section of the country did, the railroad managers of two parallel lines from the coal fields to the Lakes, both single-track roads, seeing the difficulty of handling the congested traffic over single-track lines, and at one time having had sufficiently intimate and friendly relations to have contemplated a merger, suggested that they would take from the coal fields to the Lakes the loaded trains over one line, keeping them constantly moving in one direction, and they would take the empty trains of cars back to the mines over the other line, keeping them moving in one direction, and thereby adding notably to the efficiency of the service.

But what happened? Our old statute in Ohio forbidding pooling or joint operation or any friendly cooperation was called to the attention of the courts and that helpful contribution to efficiency in an emergency was halted by the courts of the State of Ohio.

Of course, under Government control you eliminate those things. It is a pity that we could not have eliminated them long ago. Now we shall have Government control, probably, founded on the investigation and conclusions of some of the most eminent railroad talent in the United States, after six or eight months of careful, studious work in trying to solve this difficult situation, and if it proves a success, then the achievement wrought through the suspension of the laws of this country will be used as an argument for Government control of the railway system of the land.

If you are going to control the railroads, and if you are going to control the fuel supply and the food supply in this country, it is not at all abnormal to reach out and take control of the paper supply. The next logical step, if the advertisers or the subscribers of this country have a grievance about prices, is for Government control of the press, and we have more or less of that already, without the financial obligations that go with public business.

Where are we drifting? I listened the other day to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with very deep interest in his tribute to the individualism which brought about the development of this country. I want to supplement what he said and go on record as saying now that notwithstanding many of the plausible theories of the socialistic doctrines which are being applied in this country just now, and some of them may be helpful—and, so far as the promotion of brotherhood is concerned, I cordially agree—I make the prediction that the socialistic tendency of this country to-day will prove to be the Nation's paralysis. It will stop every development. It will hinder every initiative essential to the progress of the people in the making of a great nation.

I hope, Senators, while we find ourselves brought to the test on a little measure relating to news-print control in this country when there is not any essential call for it, there will be enough Members of this body to assert their convictions and say, "No; we are not going to do these things that are not necessary to the winning of the war."

If it were necessary to paralyze America to save us from Germany I would vote for that paralysis. I remember some of my colleagues in this body criticized me rather severely some months ago when I ventured to say in a rather informal way that I believed a dictator was necessary to the winning of the war. Whether I was wise in saying it or not, you now have the dictator, and I think we are going to win the war. We must; we will. But listen, Senators. Let us not hamper ourselves for the trial to come in the recovery after the war. Let us not put the manufacture of paper, let us not put the manufacture of wearing apparel, let us not put the manufacture of the thousand and one things that are not directly related to the war in the hands of Government control in order to increase the tremendous population which has turned Washington from a normal, easy-going Capital into an over-crowded mining camp, where we have not only the adventurers and those who sell for war but the profiteerers who are seeking fat places in Government service.

Mr. President, I had not expected to talk to this hour on this subject. I do not know that I have said to the Members of the Senate the things that I wanted to convey to them. But business is one thing and politics is another, and I am convinced that they do not always satisfactorily mix. I do not want to find myself supplicating a Washington bureau for a supply of news print with which to issue the publication for which I am the sponsor. I do not want to put into the hands of the President of the United States, even though he be as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] said yesterday, "the most popular and worshipped man in the world to-day," the power to say, "No; Harding's Marion Star does not get any newspaper supply until everybody else is cared for." I do not want to make it possible for the President of the United States or any agency of the President of the United States to punish in its news supply any newspaper in this land. Let us be content with what the Postmaster General can do to us. You have not thought of all these things; there are too many others that have been given consideration.

So, Senators, I admonish you who have honored me with your hearing, let us call it to the attention of others in this body who are unable to be here, either because of their engagements or who are unwilling to be here; and let us ask them to halt this tendency until the necessity is proven for such radical action.

I submit that the Senator from Arizona has not made a very strong case, because the newspapers of this country are going to be more injured than helped by the passage of this joint resolution. You can never bring paper down to anything like the normal price until you have encouraged a sufficient production in this country, or encourage a production for import, to meet the demand. I warn you now, you will never increase the production under Government regulation and control. If you want to put the Government into the manufacture, then you are only adding one more nail into the great casket in which you are going to bury the Republic that we boast of and put in its place a socialistic order that will be the land of paralysis and hopelessness for all time to come.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I am not surprised at all at the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], but I am somewhat surprised at the mistaken historical facts which he brings out in reference to the price of print paper. He gives as an illustration the great increase of print-paper cost at the time of the Spanish-American War. I have before me a compilation made by Mr. Tuttle, former treasurer of the New York Tribune, for the period of many years, and then of the International Paper Co., who gives the following as the price of paper during the years named.

Beginning with 1860, it was 8 cents a pound. During the Civil War it reached 22 cents, and it was not before 1874 that it got below 12 cents. In 1889 it was 3 cents, and in 1896 it had reached 2.25 cents, and in 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900, and 1901, clear through all the reconstructive industries, if you please, if any had ever been dislocated during the Spanish-American War, in those years afterwards this same paper we are talking about to-day sold for 1.8 cents a pound. That answers the congested condition that the Senator spoke of in the present war time. Now, taking the present war, in 1913 all this paper sold at 2.25 cents. So in 1910, 1911, 1912, 1913. In 1914 the paper sold at 2.15 cents, in 1915 at 2.15 cents, in 1916 at 2.15 cents. That is where the combination of which I have spoken began and where the Senate, after its operations, passed a resolution giving to the Trade Commission the power to investigate and make a report to Congress. Through the investigation of that commission the facts were found as I have set forth in the report on this joint resolution, and a good deal more will be found if the Senator will refer to the report of the commission that I had not the time nor the inclination to print in full in the report on the pending joint resolution. So the Senator's statement is not true. They are selling independent paper in New York at 2.5 cents, and never asked any more.

Yet it is a very easy matter for the gentlemen running a great business to manipulate it in this way. As I said before, it is not in any sense immoral. It is the result of the tendency of human trade. If I have advantages, I want to keep them as long as I can keep outside of any indication or suspicion of any moral turpitude about it. So the men feel who have the right and essential advantage in the distribution of this paper and in the purchase of it. I ask my friend what cares he for the price of paper? If the price is going high, he can absolutely kill all competition. If it is 10 cents a pound, they will quit the business.

The resolution looks to controlling the price of paper and keeping it at a fair price, and a fair price is to be found by the Trade Commission. Every item of cost that the Senator spoke of will be justly and fairly estimated by any sensible board in ascertaining the cost of production. If they find that the men who are manufacturing it can not make any profit under 4 cents I have not any doubt, neither has any man here a doubt they would recommend a profit sufficient to pay all that these men ought to receive in time of war and furnish what I consider and what any thoughtful man who will give his attention to it must consider an extremely vital element, if you please, in the conduct of the war itself.

I am paying the newspapers no particular tribute, but with few exceptions these newspapers, whatever their politics, have stood behind this Government in the awful struggle through which it is now marching. Without their aid what would you have done with your liberty loans? What would you have done when you made an appeal for a conscription law, if you please? What would you have done in every great effort that is so essential to ending the war successfully if it had not been for the universal support that the press of the country gave to the great measures which we were considering?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator what would have become of the newspapers of the country if they had opposed the liberty loan or the conscription law. What would have happened to them?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know what might have happened to them. A good many of them did it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Their subscribers would have repudiated them.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. A good many that did it are still running.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not many of them who opposed the liberty loan? I do not know of any.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I notice that none of them suffered very materially afterwards. But I should like to know what would become of them if you are going to charge them under a combination 8 cents a pound.

Mr. GALLINGER. Nobody proposes that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If in this trouble they are entitled to any sort of consideration nobody should trespass on their rights. These men have made a profit of 29 per cent after deducting taxes and everything else. Do you tell me that they themselves are not ready to submit to a profit say of 10 per cent, or whatever is necessary, that the paper may be sold to those needing it, and to the United States Government as well as any other applicant for it at a fair and reasonable price?

I am not going to stand here and debate now what is going to happen after the war, the seizure of railroads, and all that. I only protest against that argument being used and arousing all the prejudices that can be excited for the purpose of hurting this particular measure. It is an ingenious way of argument to say that something is going to happen, and here is a bill going along the same line, less hurtful, it is true, but if we pass it the newpapers can never be printed again without governmental supervision.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator is it not true that on two occasions press censorship was sought here and voted down by a majority, and is not this the rankest form of press censorship that it is possible to be set up in the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Emphatically and absolutely there is not one vestige of fact in the suggestion. You can not find an editorial to that effect in any paper in the country. I have three or four thousand editorials on the very question of censorship. There is no protest from a single one of them on that ground. Read the report of the committee on the joint resolution and you will see how much the newspapers fear censorship.

Mr. STONE. I should like to inquire in what way the joint resolution, if enacted into a statute, could be made or would be made an instrumentality of censoring the newspapers of the country?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not know, unless they want to claim that inasmuch as you have the power of distribution the parties having the power would say, "We do not like the color of your hair or the cut of your jib, or something you have said in the newspapers, and therefore we, the great commission for the sole purpose of being absolutely fair in the world, will say that newspaper shall stop." That is not the commission suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire. If it attempted anything like that, the vote has already been shown in this body, and not only that, but from the inspiration that warms the hearts of every one of us we know that the commission itself would not stand for five minutes in the respect of the world if it attempted to do these little prejudicial damages to people who did not happen to speak according to their particular wishes. It is ridiculous to talk about it and to belittle this question to such a degree as that.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks I made before the Senator from Missouri took the floor I ask unanimous consent to have printed, rather than to read it, an editorial on the question of the control of print paper coming from the Editor and Publisher, of New York, on January 5. It is very largely an expression of the views which I entertain. I have indicated by marks on the paper what I should like to have appear in the RECORD at the end of my speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the request, Mr. President?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My request is, because my throat is in bad condition, that instead of reading it there may be printed in the RECORD an editorial on the very questions which we are now discussing.

Mr. GALLINGER. From what paper?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. From the New York Editor and Publisher, a paper about 45 or 50 years old, I think.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while I am, as a rule, opposed to loading down the RECORD with newspaper editorials and articles of various kinds, which practice we have carried to an alarming extent, I can not object to this editorial going into the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator from New Hampshire knows full well that he and I equally agree as to that, and I commend his course in regard to it; but I have never heard the question raised, when a Senator on the floor has asked that a particular matter be incorporated in his remarks, as to permitting it to be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the editorial will be printed, as requested.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Editor and Publisher, Jan. 5, 1918.]

FEDERAL CONTROL.

We have Government control of the railroads, and the skies have not fallen nor has the social fabric been shattered. In a commonwealth—of which a republic is the best example—sovereignty is vested in the people and delegated by them to chosen executives. In normal times the exercise of authority over the people, in whom it is primarily vested and from whose collective will it must proceed, is attended, happily, with as little interference with individual freedom as is compatible with the communal interest.

In war times, when the national purpose is unified and the national needs paramount, individual interests are subject to the merciless test of "the common good."

The immediate task of the Nation, to which all individual interests must contribute, is the winning of the war. That the railroads may become an effective part of the fighting machinery of the Nation, their direction has been placed in the hands of one man. That the commodities essential to the life of the people and for the conduct of the war may have preference in shipment, priority orders are formulated. The necessities are given right of way.

Some timorous people profess to see great danger in the present internal policies of the Government—in the adoption of Federal control of the vital business interests of the country. Jealous of any menace to individual rights, these people see in this drastic action an attack upon the sacred citadel. It is a mistaken alarm. The ship of state is steaming steadily and stoutly in stormy seas, and its navigating officers seek first to conserve the safety of the ship, and must not permit that purpose to be disregarded in order to cater to the comfort whims of the passengers.

In view of the larger adoption of the policy of Federal control, the opponents of such control of the news-print industry sound a feeble and unconvincing note of protest. As a matter of fact and as a conclusion based upon common sense, Federal control of the news-print industry is now necessary—necessary alike to the sellers and to the users of that commodity.

With control vested in the Federal Trade Commission, as the pending Smith resolution provides, the publishers of the country will have at Washington a governmental agency committed to the task of supervising the distribution of news print. The publisher whose supply may be held up through freight congection would then be able, through the intervention of the Trade Commission, to have his shipment hurried to him in ample time to meet his urgent needs. Under present conditions, with the railroads committed to priority orders in freight handling—some of these orders perhaps not of the wisest—the publisher whose carload of paper is sidetracked somewhere has small chance of speeding up its journey. The Trade Commission, armed with authority, could quickly unravel these shipping tangles. Convinced, as the commissioners are, that the publication of newspapers is a war need of the primal sort, they would see to it that no newspaper should face suspension through a lack of news print.

The distribution of news print under war conditions can not be managed properly under any plan short of Federal control. That the Congress should hesitate to establish such control is due, in large part, to the lethargy of publishers in the matter. If every user of news print should see to it that his Representative at Washington is fully informed of the conditions existing and of the urgent need of Government control, the Smith resolution would meet with little opposition.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, under the present law the Postmaster General is clothed with sufficient power to shut newspapers out of the mail when they do not speak in accordance with the judgment of departmental officials. Now, there is a censorship, but here is a bill which proposes merely to prevent undue extortion by a certain class of producers upon a certain class of consumers. To say that if that power is granted the governmental agencies would undertake to control distribution or to direct distribution in a way to inflict punishment, so to speak, upon a given newspaper or upon a number of newspapers seems impossible.

Mr. WATSON. May I interrupt the Senator? Does he agree that if the Federal Trade Commission sought to use the power in that way that under the terms and provisions of this joint resolution they have the power and that they could do it?

Mr. STONE. I doubt it. I do not think so. I do not think that the Federal Trade Commission would be given the power under the terms of the joint resolution to deny to me, one publisher, the right to have my supplies in a wholly different and to me a hurtful way from that in which like supplies would be furnished to the Senator from Indiana, if he were conducting a publication similar to mine. That would be such a gross abuse of power that I think the courts could be appealed to to remedy it, and I do not believe it would ever be attempted.

Mr. SMOOT. However, the joint resolution authorizes it.

Mr. STONE. If the joint resolution authorizes any such thing as that, which I do not believe——

Mr. SMOOT. That is what it does.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Utah so construes it, I assume; but I do not. If, however, it does, by a line or a change of word or two, any such power as that, if it is sought to confer it, could be withdrawn from the provisions of the joint resolution. There is no need of being hypercritical about this joint resolution. If such power as that indicated by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is written in the language of the joint resolution, it can be easily rectified; but, Mr. President, I do not think we ought to be hunting mere excuses here and there to throttle this measure. Let us settle it upon its broad merits.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss this proposition at any considerable length. I have made plain to the Senate the ground of my opposition to it. It is putting the Government into a private business wholly unrelated to and entirely disconnected with the real prosecution of this war. There is no reason for it, from the standpoint of giving relief to the newspaper publishers, because it has not been many months since the Post Office Department submitted proof to the Senate showing that every penny of the increased expense to which these publications have been put as to print paper, in most cases at least, has been passed on to the public, usually through the advertising rates.

It is inconceivable to my mind that the ordinary criminal laws and the great volume of trust laws that we have are not efficient to relieve the situation, if there is a combination in restraint of trade or operating in violation of law. Unless we are prepared to admit that our system of trust regulation and suppression, and of criminal prosecution for violations of the laws against restraint of trade or combinations in restraint of trade, have utterly failed, there is no justification whatever for this measure.

It seems to me, Mr. President, as if day by day, and in one transaction after another, in many important particulars we are absolutely departing from the great structural principles on which this Government rests. We have built up a centralized Federal power in this Government, and in matters wholly unrelated to the prosecution of this war, that would have amazed Alexander Hamilton, and that exceed the wildest dream that he ever dreamed; and Democrats still professing the Democratic faith have done it. We have surrendered in many important and essential features the principle, not only fundamentally Democratic, but fundamentally American, of local self-government. We did it when we passed the child-labor law, undertaking to regulate the hours and terms and conditions on which labor may be employed in every State of the Union; we did it when we abandoned the ancient, historic, democratic, yea, American, position on the liquor question, and said that the Government of the United States, acting nationally, should control that question, instead of each locality asserting its own will with respect to it.

It is proposed now to do it, not only with respect to such little measures as the one proposed by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], but with respect to the suffrage question. The right of each State to fix and determine for itself the qualifications of its electors is one of the fundamental propositions that underlie and support local self-government, if not the one most fundamental of them all.

In that connection, I want to read the thoughtful words of the greatest Democratic newspapers in the North. I agree with them in part, at least. I believe, however, that the application of the memorial address printed this morning in the New York World is broader than a mere party application. The dirge that ought to be sung is not only the death of Democratic ideals and Democratic principles, but of American ideals and American principles. The editorial is entitled "In memoriam," and it reads as follows:

The World's famous question, "Shall the Democratic Party die?" has been answered. The historical Democratic Party is dead.

We do not mean that the Democratic organization has ceased to exist. We do not mean that there are no more Democrats. Nor do we mean that the Democratic Party is dead in the sense that the Federalist Party is dead, or the Whig Party is dead, or the Greenback Party is dead, or the Populist Party is dead. What has died is the Democratic Party of Jefferson and Jackson and Tilden. The principles of government which they enunciated and advocated have been obliterated. What slavery and secession and silver were unable to accomplish has been brought about by prohibition and woman suffrage.

The deathblow to Jeffersonian Democracy was delivered by the Democratic Senators and Representatives from the South and West under the leadership of William J. Bryan, who carried through the prohibition amendment. The coup de grâce was administered by Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, in indorsing the Federal suffrage amendment to the Constitution.

The kind of government for which the Jeffersonian Democracy successfully battled for more than a century has been repudiated. Centralization is now invited, not repelled. State rights have been assassinated in the ancient citadel of State rights. The charter of local self-government has become a scrap of paper. The way is now open for the obliteration of the States in all their essential functions and the erection of a central government more powerful than anything of which Alexander Hamilton dared to dream.

To-day there are no fundamental differences of principle between Democrats and Republicans. The two parties are interchangeable so far as any vital profession of faith is concerned. Republicans claim to be better business men than Democrats, and hence quicker and slicker in grabbing a dollar; Democrats claim to be more honest and simple-minded than Republicans. Republicans bitterly resent the fact that the Democrats are in possession of the Federal Government. Democrats resent with equal bitterness the disgusting ambition of the Republicans to get back into power. It is not of such stuff that great parties are formed or great issues are vitalized.

Perhaps it was all inevitable. Perhaps it was ordained that a time would come when an impatient people would deliberately throw away as too cumbersome the old system of checks and balances that the fathers provided in framing the Constitution and give over the minority to the tyranny of the majority until a new system could be created in the light of better experience. It is difficult to quarrel with events, however much we may regret them, but dangerous to ignore them.

A great revolution has suddenly come about in the Government of the United States. Strangely enough, it has come about during the Presidency of one of the greatest Democrats in all history—whose leadership is hardly less commanding in Europe than at home—a leadership which in many respects holds out hope of democracy in civilization. Yet under that leadership the institutions of the United States have been permanently changed without a word of protest from him in one instance and with his active assistance in the other. The clock can not be turned back. Yet we may wonder if the President is so keenly absorbed in the processes of anarchy in Russia as to be oblivious to what is happening to our own institutions.

It is possible that out of the stress and circumstance of this world war will come a new Democratic Party in the United States—a Wilsonian democracy in place of a Jeffersonian democracy. But can it find means of restoring the balance and provide new methods for insuring that organized self-control without which all free government is bound to sink to the present level of Russia or is forced to establish an elective autocracy as a means of self-preservation? We shall see what we shall see.

Of the two instruments by which the old Jeffersonian democracy succeeded in committing suicide the most dangerous weapon, of course, is prohibition. Suffrage by Federal amendment, in spite of its perversion of the original theory of American institutions, is at least an extension of human freedom. It is not, like prohibition, an absolute suffocation of individual rights and personal liberties at the mandate of three-fourths of the legislatures. The suffrage amendment may result in as many complications and misfortunes as the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments produced, but we can say of it that ipso facto it invades no man's home, nor does it prescribe what he may eat or what he may drink or how he shall order his life.

At the same time the two amendments taken together, the one championed by southern Democrats still giving a lip service to the old party faith, and the other indorsed by the President who deliberately abandoned an issue on which he was reelected in 1916, are as completely at variance with all the fundamental purposes of the old democracy as those purposes were at variance with federalism.

The World has never been able to regard change and progress as synonymous, and it can not do so in this instance. Nor can we believe that the advantages of the political expediency which have dictated official Democratic policy in regard to these issues are adequate compensation for the utter sacrifice of principles which had given to the Democratic Party the longest continuous history of any political party in the world.

Possibly we are too apprehensive about the future, but a change of so radical a character may well be considered apprehensively. Each generation must work out its own salvation, and it is not wholly beyond the nature of things that out of the ashes of the old Democratic Party will spring a new democracy more vigorous and more insistent than ever upon these elementary rights without the continuous assertion of which free institutions have never succeeded in maintaining themselves. That remains to be seen.

The World is no prophet of disaster. In paying a respectful tribute to the dead it implies no reproach to the living. But the record is the record.

So speaks the greatest Democratic newspaper of the Nation this morning in its leading editorial. If it be not considered treason in these momentous and stirring times to express my agreement, I want to say that, in part at least, I agree with this editorial. The ancient party of my faith, the party of Jefferson, of Jackson, of Tilden, and of Cleveland, is no more. If there is a Democrat alive to-day in the Senate or out of it or anywhere in this Republic who can show me a single principle to which it has proven its fidelity, I would like to have him stand up and name it.

I do not think our Republican friends are in much, if any better, position; but I know that the Democratic faith that I learned at my mother's knee and that I have cherished all my life is not respected or followed here. Local self-government! Is it the corner stone of the Democratic faith? If so, wherein have you kept the covenant? A low tariff, for revenue only! I can demonstrate to any audience, in this body or out of it, that in many instances we have proven false to that profession of faith. Opposition to federalism, to strong centralized power! When did we cease to believe in it? We certainly have long since ceased to practice such opposition.

Mr. President, I must confess that at times I almost despair of the Republic when I see one autocratic power piled upon the top of another unnecessarily and without a word of protest or of challenge. I realize that when we are engaged in a war the Executive ought to be given every power that is necessary for its adequate prosecution, and no man would be quicker to bestow that power than would I; but this movement did not begin with this war; it is not related to this war; it is totally disconnected with this war. When it is all over and the war is won, I hope the people of America will get back some few of their liberties; but, so far as I am concerned, unless some one can show to me the absolute and direct connection of measures of this sort with the war itself and with its actual and direct prosecution, I am disposed to keep a few of my liberties instead of surrendering them all. I know we will have those that we do not surrender, but I am not certain whether we will get back those that we do surrender and, if we ever do get them back, when we will get them back.

This is no war measure in any sense, in any shape, form, or fashion. If you want to pass it because you are willing to concede that Jefferson's old idea that the least governed people are the best governed people, that the idea under which we have all operated, the idea that individual initiative and individual enterprise could run the private business and the private industry of this country, regulated by law and controlled by law, and when they violate the laws against combinations and trusts prosecuted and punished by law—I say, if you want to concede that all that has failed and you want to set up a socialistic government, strongly centralized, with its powers here in Washington increased until the powers of the present Executive exceed those ever conferred upon or ever wielded by even the most despotic and autocratic of the Caesars, and in matters wholly unrelated to and entirely disconnected with this war, then, of course, we will know what we are facing and what we are about to embrace.

Mr. President, I know not what course other Senators may adopt—I care, of course, very vitally—but so far as I am concerned, I wish to put the Senate and the country on notice here and now, on this measure and on all others, that I propose, so far as I can, to see that this Government remains a Government of coordinated powers; I propose to do all in my power to prevent the building up of despotic and democratic and unnecessary power and authority in the hands of any one man, be he termed President or what not.

The Constitution itself confers on the Chief Executive ample power, plenary power, for the prosecution of the war, and I have no objection to giving him all the power that any Executive ought to have for the prosecution of the war, but, Senators, I warn you, do not on that account and for that reason, because we are in this war, let pass every sort of measure that may come in here labeled a war measure seeking to give to the Executive this power and that power and the other power during the war, in that way building up an executive authority the like of which was never seen in a free country—an executive authority so great that if we do not finally check this movement the country can not long remain free.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if there were any prospect of an immediate vote upon this measure, I should not detain the Senate by discussing it. From intimations which have been expressed, however, I infer that a vote to-day will be practically out of the question, and consequently I do not feel that I am trespassing upon the time of the Senate in suggesting some reasons which will impel me to support the resolution.

In 1916 we created what is known as the Federal Trade Commission, and armed it with certain powers and responsibilities, by a bill which was the subject of very extensive and elaborate discussion in both Houses. I was unable to lend it the sanction of my approval, because I could not perceive how the commission under its provisions would be able to rectify the abuses at which it was aimed. I felt that it should go much further or that we should not assume to legislate upon the subject at all.

I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, yet I think it is fair to assert that the operations of the commission since the enactment of the law have not been entirely satisfactory or successful. That may be due to the personnel of the commission quite as much as to the powers which the bill conferred upon them. As to that, I make no comment; I do not know. From the report of the committee upon this joint resolution, however, and assuming its correctness, it appears that the commission's efforts to control the evil at which this joint resolution is aimed have been unsuccessful. Upon page 6 of that report appears an extract from the report of the commission regarding the news-print situation, which recites that—

> The efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions in the news-print industry expeditiously and to arbitrate and effectively project a fair price for news-print paper have failed.

That is a confession either that the commission is not equal to the duty which has been imposed upon it, or that the law imposing that duty is so defective as to make the object sought to be attained beyond the power of the commission. But, however that may be, the commission is upon record that as to this particular difficulty its efforts to remove it have failed. The report recites, in some degree, what those efforts have been, for one of the conclusions reached between the commission and the combination was the fixing of a certain maximum price for its product, shortly after which some members of the combination withdrew from the arbitration, and as a consequence the arrangement proposed was ineffective.

Now, what are the conditions confronting the country and which provoke this joint resolution? Briefly stated, they are that a certain number of manufacturers of a very important and highly essential commodity have formed a combination, including manufacturers whose output embraces practically 80 per cent of the product, whose purpose it is to dominate that particular business, and to make successful competition impossible. The outline of the agreement is set forth on page 7 of the report, and that I assume to have been the basis of the indictment afterwards presented against a very considerable number of those executing it which indictment has been followed by what the lawyers call a nolo contendere, which does not involve an admission of guilt upon the one hand, but requires the infliction of a penalty upon the other.

This agreement is "to refrain from competing with each other in the matter of securing new customers for their paper; to refrain from competing with each other as to the quality of the paper to be sold; to refrain from competing with each other as to the delivery of and furnishing storage for paper sold but not delivered; to refrain from competing with each other as to the terms of credit, rate of interest on open accounts, dates of beginning and ending of contracts, the methods of making sales of paper through salesmen, dealers, and jobbers, the payment of return freight on the cores upon which their paper is wrapped, the payment of charges for cartage, and allowance of claims for waste or damaged paper; to engage in simultaneous representations to the public, to their customers, and to each other of the alleged increased cost of manufacture and of the alleged shortage of news-print paper, and to manufacture insufficient quantities of such paper with the object of concertedly working for materially higher prices; to cooperate in discouraging the erection of new mills or the installation of new machines for the manufacture of news print; to cooperate in preventing new concerns from competing with them by transferring orders and contracts for paper to new concerns on condition that such new companies should not compete with them; to furnish from time to time to the News Print Manufacturers' Association at No. 18 East Forty-first Street, New York City, for the information of the defendants, full and complete information concerning contracts with their customers and the quantity of the paper manufactured, carried in stock, or sold by them; also, the capacity of their various plans, and other details of their business."

It appears, in addition to this agreement, or as a part of it, that the country was partitioned out between and among these manufacturers, each having his own set of customers with whom the others would in no wise interfere, in that way still further strengthening the monopoly inevitably resulting from these drastic covenants.

Mr. President, I am unable to imagine anything which could be added to this agreement which would make it a more complete, searching, and far-reaching combination in restraint of trade than appears from the language cited. It was evidently made with much deliberation, and with the full and complete knowledge of all of the conditions connected with the print-paper trade. Unless all human experience is at fault, the purpose of the combination was to enhance the price of the product to the consumer by compelling him to purchase from one customer, and from one customer only, because under such an agreement competition was out of the question.

It may be, Mr. President, that the day of competition is over. It may be that those who contend that competition is wasteful, and productive of anything but benefit as an ultimate result, are correct. But in view of the fact that Congress has not so determined, but, upon the contrary, has enacted legislation penalizing such combinations in the interest of fair competition, the question for this purpose is foreclosed. The law has been written, and it must and ought to speak for itself; and that law has placed the ban not only of disapproval but of criminality upon such a combination as this, and upon all similar combinations against which the Federal Trade Commission is confessedly powerless, and regarding which indictments are lightly set aside upon pleas of nolo contendere, followed by fines so infinitely out of all proportion to the enormous amount of profit resulting from these agreements as to justify, perhaps, the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] that the courts of the country, as well as this commission, are inadequate to deal with the evil.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I asked that question. I did not make it in the form of a suggestion.

Mr. THOMAS. I stand corrected. I refer to the inquiry of the Senator, and not his suggestion.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator think, because the law fails in one particular in its administration, that that is an indictment of the law itself, or of the courts generally?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why can we not enforce the law against these people?

Mr. THOMAS. I think, however, that if the law fails in one direction and then fails in another direction, so that it becomes valueless, it is the duty of the lawmaker to see to it that the purpose expressed in it be made effective by laws strengthening and confirming those already in existence, but of demonstrated ineffectiveness.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. The laws to which the Senator refers were laws against combinations in restraint of trade, commonly called trusts?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, because those laws are not enforced by some particular court or in some particular instance is that a reason, according to the Senator's way of looking at things, for abandoning the system, and saying that the system is inadequate?

Mr. THOMAS. If there were but one failure, no; but if, through series of years, the laws, through the operations of the courts, their constructions——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And delays.

Mr. THOMAS (continuing). And delays, prove inadequate for the purpose, in consequence of which the interests affected may in some instances be brought to the verge of ruin and in others across the verge, then I think further legislation is essential; and I think that if ever there was a case about which there seems to be no dispute as to its facts it is the case with which this joint resolution proposes to deal.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I should like to understand that. Will the Senator explain to me why that is true? Is it because some particular district court will not enforce the law?

Mr. THOMAS. It is because the Trade Commission has confessed its inability to deal with it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, that would not be very important.

Mr. THOMAS. It is also because, up to this time, the courts have failed to deal with it properly and effectively. That is why I make the statement. It may be an inadequate reason; doubtless it is, in the judgment of my distinguished friend from Georgia; but to my mind it is convincing. If there were no war pending, and this situation addressed itself to my judgment in times of peace, accompanied by this sort of a report, and the Committee on Printing saw fit to offer such a joint resolution, I think I would support it, not because it presents the best remedy in the world, not because it is desirable, but because it seems to be the one essential step which the Government must take, if it is taken at all, to remedy the evil, since the power does not exist elsewhere, and which, in my judgment, it ought to take, in view of the fact that we have heretofore assumed charge of the general trust question, and to legislate nationally regarding it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, does it bother the Senator for me to interrupt him?

Mr. THOMAS. Not at all, although my voice is not in as good condition as I would like.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will not interrupt the Senator if he prefers not to be interrupted.

Mr. THOMAS. It is all right; I am perfectly willing to be.

Mr. HARDWICK. Would the Senator, then, applying that principle, be willing to abandon the laws against trusts and combinations in every line of industry and of business where some court or several courts have failed to administer them according to his ideas?

Mr. THOMAS. That is a very pertinent question.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is what it means, I think.

Mr. THOMAS. In every instance like the one under consideration that is brought to our attention; yes. I do not know that we should go hunting for them; but where they are brought, as this is brought, to our attention, and where the record is so one-sided as this seems to be, that is our relief or we have none.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Applying the same line of reasoning, then, to the Standard Oil Co. case or the American Tobacco Co. case, or any one of the cases where this has happened, where a dissolution was decreed by the courts and such a reorganization was effected by the corporation or corporations involved that in the opinion of many people the dissolution decree did not amount to very much, would the Senator then be in favor of Government ownership and operation in those fields?

Mr. THOMAS. The dissolution of the Standard Oil Co. and of the American Tobacco Co. resulted merely in a transformation of the companies and the continuation of their businesses ostensibly by separate concerns, but I imagine really by the same general control. In each of those instances the law, although applied, failed to accomplish the object desired. With regard to the Standard Oil Co., however, it has relieved the producing end of the oil business from that monopoly which previously existed. But I will say to the Senator that whenever it shall appear to the Congress, as it appears in this case, that either of those companies or any other companies controlling a large majority of the business make an agreement like this, we should treat the situation just as we propose to treat this, unless it be possible to suggest something equally effective, which up to this time the genius of man does not seem to have discovered.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield again, why is not the enforcement of the statute laws, as written, better?

Mr. THOMAS. If the statute laws as written—and I speak now of the antitrust acts rather than of the Federal Trade Commission act, which I do not think that we should have adopted in its present form—can be enforced so as to produce the result desired; yes. They never have been, however, and even in cases where they have been successfully applied the resultant has been merely a change of appearances while the substance of the thing sought to be destroyed has continued.

Perhaps it might be well, if it could be done by legislative enactment, to place concerns like these in the hands of a receiver until they shall conform to the requirements of the law as written and conduct their business in a lawful manner; but we can not appoint receivers by legislation. That is a judicial act; and while I do not intend to reflect upon the courts, I may be pardoned for expressing some skepticism with regard to their general attempted enforcements of this and kindred legislation. I do not in the slightest degree impugn their integrity in calling attention to the fact that with the refined constructions and exceptions and differences and distinctions with which all of the decisions upon these antitrust laws fairly bristle no man knows what he can do nor what he should refrain from doing, the law to-day being in a greater state of unsettlement than it was when judicial construction first began.

Mr. President, I do not believe in governmental control or in Government ownership per se. I am satisfied that private operation of business of all kinds, except it be with regard to public utilities, is eminently preferable to governmental control or interference. I think everyone will agree to that. But I believe in Government control in certain instances, of which this is one, when it appears to be the last alternative, without the exercise of which the evil complained of may be aggravated instead of diminished, until those who are its victims shall be stripped of all their possessions.

My friend the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day deprecated the constantly growing tendency of all interests and of all individuals to appeal to Congress and the General Government for relief against recurring evils of which they complain, whereas two or three generations ago, under the then prevailing spirit and genius and individualism, each man depended largely upon his own resources to work out his own salvation. Unfortunately, that is true; and in that tendency my friend the Senator from Georgia can find the germ of that departure from State rights which he deplores so earnestly and so mournfully. The States, for the most part, have lost their rights because they preferred to surrender them to the General Government in consideration of that Government's bearing the financial burden of their exercise.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. Does not the Senator think that those privileges have been too often surrendered for financial favors and benefits?

Mr. THOMAS. That is exactly what I say. With the editorial read by the Senator from Georgia a few moments ago I have no quarrel, except that the condition which the editor of that paper bewails is not a condition created by the adoption of the prohibition resolution or by the passage yesterday in the House of Representatives of the suffrage resolution. Those were merely its latest manifestations. It has been going on constantly for the last generation. The States have not expressly, perhaps not intentionally, but have constantly shifted their rights, their duties, and their obligations from themselves to the General Government in exchange for appropriations. I recall that it was the proudest boast of one of the Senator's most distinguished predecessors on this floor that during his long career in the House and the Senate he never asked for or received a dollar of appropriation for the benefit of his State. But that was long, long ago. The Senator who pursues such a policy now would retain his seat not longer than the expiration of his term.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator's statement is inaccurate, with due respect.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, it may be. I am not infallible.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think the Senator can instance a single case in which the States have voluntarily surrendered rights for appropriations—not of the South, at least; not Georgia, I know.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is the duty of the States to build their own roads and to improve their own water highways, except in instances where navigation—actual navigation, not navigability—is involved. The States, North and South, have long ago shifted that burden—not only shifted it but imposed it—upon the Treasury of the United States, until to-day the old doctrine that the States or the riparian proprietors were the owners of the waters of the streams, and certainly of nonnavigable streams, and of the beds thereof, has disappeared.

Mr. HARDWICK. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. THOMAS. Such are the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; it has not disappeared there, either.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is mistaken, and I think if he will examine the question as carefully as I have had occasion to do he will find that I am right. A citizen of my State can not secure the granting of a permit to divert water for irrigation in a nonnavigable stream without the permission of the Secretary of War, who must determine whether such diversion in any way impairs the navigability of the stream of which it is a tributary.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, that is a very different question from the proposition to which the Senator was alluding.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; that is the legitimate outcome of it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think so at all. That is navigability only. The ownership question has not been determined by the courts.

Mr. THOMAS. The ownership has been asserted and sustained by the Supreme Court in many cases growing out of the insistence by the State upon its right to dispose of, or of its citizens to own, the power generated by the water of these navigable streams, which has nothing whatever to do with navigability. The same is true of the public roads. Ninety per cent of the matters involved in our agricultural bills for which appropriations are asked and received are peculiarly within, and ought to be within, State jurisdiction. But inasmuch as the Government makes appropriations for them it follows as a matter of course that the rights have been shifted, until they are no longer recognized as a part and parcel of the rights of the States.

Why, Mr. President, in these days a great calamity can not occur in any of the States involving the destruction of property or loss of life, but that an appeal is instantly made to the General Government for financial and other relief, which is granted as a matter of course, but which should not form the subject of appropriations from the Federal Treasury under the old doctrine of State rights. We have progressed, and we are progressing, and we will progress until every right of the States—and there are not many left—will, in all probability, be absorbed by the General Government in exchange for fat appropriations from the Public Treasury.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hate to disturb the Senator, but I do not like to have him make a statement of that sort without my correcting it.

Mr. THOMAS. My remarks, of course, do not bind the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no; not at all. The Senator is usually very accurate in his statements, and as a general proposition he is accurate about this, but I want to take this occasion to call attention to the fact that recently one of the great cities of my State was almost totally destroyed by fire. It did not ask for one cent's aid of any sort from the Federal Government, and it is one of the boasts of the people that they did not do it, although they were almost ruined. I refer to the city of Augusta. So that the Senator can not make a general indictment of the kind he is making, which may be applicable to some of the States, without my insisting that the State of Georgia is an exception to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, one swallow does not make a summer.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the Senator started out to establish a proposition on which he has cited nothing; namely, that the States themselves have voluntarily renounced their rights and duties in order to get these appropriations.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, of course, that is a difference of contention between the Senator and myself. He does not think so. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I can not think of an instance where the States themselves have asked for these things. The Senator speaks of the change about internal improvements. The States themselves did not ask for that to be done. The people determined that here in Congress through their representatives.

Mr. THOMAS. The States are represented in Congress by Senators and by Representatives. They presumably voice, and I think they generally voice, the wishes of their constituents; and a general principle or a general condition once established, the fact that in one or two instances, or in the case of one or two States, there have not been observable the things to which I referred does not, I think, militate against the general proposition. Ever since the end of the war between the States this country has been marching constantly, and sometimes with accelerated speed, toward centralized government. The things to which the Senator referred as indicating that fact—the child-labor legislation, the legislation of similar import which from time to time has been adopted by this body, and I occupied and still occupy the same position with regard to the child-labor law that my friend from Georgia does—all are in my judgment the legitimate outgrowth of the original tendencies of the States to avoid the financial obligations which the exercise of their original duties involved. The assumption of these powers by the General Government has been sustained by the decisions of the courts of last resort, which in all probability will sustain the constitutionality of the law to which he and I have just referred.

These are the prevailing conditions, Mr. President; and I think that future historians will regard them as the outgrowth of the necessities which have arisen from our expanding population, from the multiplication of our business activities, and from the general progress of society from one stage of political and industrial activity to another.

I think it has been inevitable from the foundation of this Government that ultimately the General Government would absorb many functions of the States hitherto regarded as attributes of their sovereignty. The other day the Supreme Court of the United States, in what is popularly known as the Utah power case, determined that the States in which the public domain still exists were powerless to legislate concerning or to interfere with any policy of the General Government regarding that domain. It has gone so far, although it has not said so in exact words, as to deny the existence of the sovereign power of eminent domain with regard to the public lands in the States, a power which Mr. Calhoun, as I stated the other day, very truly declared to be one of the inseparable attributes of sovereignty.

I do not expect, Mr. President, in the short time I have to live, to see any change, unless it be one of accelerated progress in the centralizing tendencies of the Government through congressional legislation and judicial construction.

Mr. President, just another reflection with regard to this bill and for the present I am through. My support of the joint resolution is dictated by the belief and by the conviction that without it the unfortunate condition outlined in the report will be aggravated. I have no particular love for the newspaper fraternity, particularly some of them in my section of the country, but justice is justice, whether it be applied to one class in a community or to another. They are all entitled to the same treatment under the law. Newspaper print is an essential to our general everyday life. To my mind, the dissemination of news is quite as important as the dissemination of food. That which interferes with it, especially in war times, may rise to the dignity of a national calamity.

That, however, is not the only interest which this combination injures or at which it is aimed. It is aimed at all those who have use for its product, and that virtually comprises the entire country, the men and women and children composing that aggregate community which we call the United States.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, to be of sufficient importance, considered as a national question, to demand, after this investigation and failure of the Trade Commission, the due consideration of the Congress of the United States. The joint resolution, therefore, is one which is designed to supplement the power of the Trade Commission by extending it so far as to enable it, if the President shall so determine, to supervise, control, and regulate the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp. It is the taking of a long step forward, and the pertinent inquiry has been made as to whether the same conditions do not justify similar action in other directions. I think they do.

Mr. President, I believe the Food Commission should have been armed at the outset with the power not only to determine the prices of the necessities of life to the producer, but also the retail prices to the consumer. We know that at the present time a large proportion of the public are taking advantage of the war, and of the scarcity in the necessities of life which the war has produced, to make large sums of money and prodigious profits out of the everyday requirements of the citizen. That is true all over the United States and it is eminently true in the District of Columbia. This center of the Nation is inhabited by the most avaricious, the most grasping, and the most unscrupulous set of business buccaneers that can be found anywhere on the face of the globe.

Take the matter of rent, of groceries, of fuel, of all the things which minister not only to the comfort but to the actualities of existence, and the faces of not only the poor but the well-to-do and the rich are being ground more and more as the days pass; and Congress, which is the common council of the District of Columbia, has so far done nothing to check or control it.

I wish we could extend this resolution so as to include those evils, rectify them, do away with them if possible. Of course, under existing law nothing can be done, but is there anyone here who denies that it ought to be done?

The only proposal so far made is to meet it by increasing the compensation of Government officials. That is merely using the Government officials as a conduit to convey more money of the Treasury into the hands of the modern purveyors in this city particularly, as well as all over the country. My prediction now is that unless we legislate along analogous lines to meet this difficulty any increases in salary will simply be followed by a corresponding increase in the cost of the necessities of life. We recall that in 1909 Congress placed an added duty of 10 cents a box upon lemons and oranges at the behest of the growers of California. The President had hardly approved the act until the railroad companies increased their freight rate just enough to absorb that 10 cents tariff increase. That is what has been done here and what will be done until we shall interfere in earnest.

I am actuated, Mr. President, let me say in conclusion, by no sort of feeling, of which I am conscious, of prejudice against or animosity to the people who will be affected by this resolution. They are doing what a great many others are doing, and we are very apt, all of us, to justify wrongdoing by referring to the fact that the practice is common, that others do it, and therefore we are justified in following their example.

I am not advocating this measure through any animosity toward the so-called capitalistic class. I do not believe this is a capitalistic war. The charge is an infamous slander or else it is made in total ignorance of the facts. The wealth of this country has responded to the needs of the Nation, both in its contributions of money and of men, to a degree that commands my sincere admiration and entitles it to the grateful thanks of the Republic. But, of course, there are exceptions in all cases, and among these exceptions are these profiteers, whose monstrous conduct has made it necessary for the Government to bring forward this resolution, which I hope will be passed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to the following agreement, fixing a time for a final vote on the joint resolution. I understand that under the rule a quorum has to be present, and therefore I shall ask after the reading of the proposed agreement that the roll be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona submits a proposed unanimous-consent agreement, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, January 15, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon S. J. Res. 101, a joint resolution to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of print paper at a fair price, etc., through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the joint resolution or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In order to present the proposed agreement for consideration by the Senate a quorum will be necessary. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this juncture let me inform the Senate of the absence of Senators who are members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, the Committee on Manufactures, and the Committee on Military Affairs, caused by the fact that each of those committees now have investigations before them calling for the attendance of the members of the committees.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Swanson
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Thomas
Fernald	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Tillman
France	Kenyon	Pittman	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	King	Poindexter	Vardaman
Gallinger	Kirby	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Gerry	Lewis	Reed	Warren
Hale	Lodge	Shafroth	Weeks
Harding	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams
Hardwick	McNary	Sherman	Wolcott
Hitchcock	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
James	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Johnson, Cal.	New	Smoot

Mr. LEWIS. In making the announcement I neglected to do the justice to the Committee on Commerce to state that their members are also absent, caused by an investigation pending before that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask that the proposed unanimous-consent agreement may be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, January 15, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon S. J. Res. 101, a joint resolution to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of paper at a fair price and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the joint resolution or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed agreement submitted by the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator from Arizona if the joint resolution can not be printed with all the amendments so that it will be before us in the morning?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The joint resolution has been printed and all the amendments that have been offered have been printed, so that it is now before the Senate in just the form the Senator desires. It is the desire of Senators that we may vote upon the joint resolution on Tuesday in order that the Senate may recess over to-morrow. That will give Monday and Tuesday for the consideration of the measure, extending not later than 5 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. REED. I have been absent on committee work, and I have not been here since the joint resolution has been printed, but I understand it has been amended in many respects.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No vote has been taken on any amendment. All the amendments that have been offered have been printed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I would not have any objection to the limitation of debate beginning at 2 o'clock on Tuesday and to a vote being taken on that calendar day, but we had a unanimous-consent agreement here just a few days ago similar to this one, and when 5 o'clock came there were a great many very important amendments presented and not a word of debate or explanation could be heard upon them.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What was the cause of that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was simply because the time between 2 o'clock and 5 o'clock was taken up with the consideration of other amendments, and when the hour of 5 o'clock arrived a lot of amendments that had not been discussed or explained or anything of the sort were presented. I do not believe the Senate ought to put itself in that sort of a position. I would be perfectly willing that on Tuesday next after 2 o'clock the debate should be limited to 10 minutes, and that we shall vote on the calendar day. In that way we would not reach a time when amendments would be offered without any opportunity to explain them.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection to that modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the modification proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That instead of 5 o'clock the vote shall be taken on that calendar day?

Mr. SMOOT. On the calendar day of Tuesday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some time during the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement will be read as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Tuesday, January 15, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon Senate joint resolution 101, a joint resolution to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of paper at a fair price and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the joint resolution or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona if he would not be willing to make it Wednesday instead of Tuesday. Some of us are tied down with committee work.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will agree to make it any day in the week that will suit Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed modification will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Wednesday, January 16——

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggested modification is withdrawn.

Mr. STONE. I ask if Senators will not agree that after 2 o'clock on Tuesday debate shall be limited to 10 minutes on the joint resolution and the amendments pending and offered up to 5 o'clock, and that thereafter a vote on the final passage of the joint resolution shall be taken during the calendar day.

Mr. SMOOT. The hour of 5 o'clock has been eliminated.

Mr. STONE. Let the proposed agreement be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the agreement as it now stands modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on the calendar day of Tuesday, January 15, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon S. J. Res. 101, a joint resolution to provide further for the national security and defense by insuring to the Government of the United States an adequate supply of paper at a fair price and by insuring a supply and equitable distribution at fair prices to the industries of the United States, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the joint resolution or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. STONE. The point I have in mind is that we shall vote on the calendar day of January 15, and that after 2 o'clock on that day there shall be no debate by any Senator exceeding 10 minutes, and so forth. There is no limitation whatsoever placed in the order as read as to the time when there may be a final vote upon the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. During that day.

Mr. SMOOT. At 12 o'clock at night the day ends.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We are to vote on that calendar day.

Mr. SMOOT. Not the legislative day, but the calendar day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and it is entered into.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3235) amending section 32, Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 14, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 11, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who hast compassed the pathway of our life from the beginning, we thank Thee that Thy Providence abides through every change, which has given to us our homes, and all that makes them dear; our Government, with its glorious institutions.

May the memory of those who died that it might live, inspire us to loyalty, deepen our patriotism, that it may abide through all time, and be a blessing to untold generations yet to come.

Let Thy blessing descend upon these Representatives of the people. Give to them patience, courage, wisdom, that they may adjust all questions which may present themselves, to Thy will; and all praise and gratitude be Thine, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WATER-POWER COMMITTEE.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I present the following privileged report, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 216.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a special committee of 18 members to whom all bills and resolutions hereafter introduced during the Sixty-fifth Congress pertaining to the development or utilization of water power shall be referred (notwithstanding any general rule of the House to the contrary), except, however, bills and resolutions of which the Committee on Foreign Affairs has jurisdiction under the general rules of the House.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be, and it is hereby, discharged from further consideration of H. R. 3808, H. R. 7695, H. R. 4504, H. R. 8005, and S. 1419, and said bills are hereby referred to the special committee herein provided for; that the Committee on Public Lands is discharged from further consideration of H. R. 7227, and the same is hereby referred to the special committee aforesaid; that the chairman of said special committee be, and he is hereby, empowered to appoint a clerk subject to its approval.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the resolution upon the ground that this committee has no privilege to report a resolution providing for the appointment of a clerk. The Committee on Rules has no special privilege to report any such resolution. At the conclusion of the resolution which has just been read appears the following:

that the chairman of said special committee be, and he is hereby, empowered to appoint a clerk subject to its approval.

Mr. POU. The resolution does not provide for any appropriation.

Mr. SANFORD. The Committee on Rules has certain privileges to report resolutions, but among those privileges is not the privilege to provide for the appointment of a clerk to a committee. Section 56 of Rule XI:

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, viz: The Committee on Rules, on rules, joint rules, and order of business.

It seems to me too plain for argument that the matter of this resolution does not come within that privilege.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, it seems to me that it is too plain for argument that the point of the gentleman from New York is not well taken. The provision in the resolution which has just been reported does not provide for any appropriation. It is a controverted point, at least among some of the best parliamentarians of the House, as to whether or not it would destroy the privileged character of a resolution if it did carry an appropriation, but the Committee on Rules was particular in drafting the resolution in respect to the wording not to incorporate any provision that carried an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman say about the point that is made by the gentleman from New York that the Committee on Rules is not authorized to bring in a rule about a clerk?

Mr. POU. My reply to that is I do not think it is well taken. A clerk is a necessary and essential part in the make-up of a committee, a part of the necessary machinery of a committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The general rules of the House provide that each regular standing committee shall have a clerk. This is a special order. There is nothing unusual about this. Every resolution in all the years that has been brought in providing for special committees of investigation has always carried a provision that the committee should have the right to select such clerical aid as it might need. At times the resolution has provided that the committee might employ lawyers. It has never been held that that destroys the privileged character of the resolution. It has been held, however, that if the resolution carries an appropriation it destroys the privileged character of it.

Mr. POU. It would be an anomalous situation if the Committee on Rules had the power to bring in a report creating a committee and yet did not have authority to provide machinery for the necessary work of that committee.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, of course primarily I think the question is a question of privilege; that is, as to whether or not the Committee on Rules has a right to report this as a privileged rule. The provision with regard to the privilege character of reports from the Committee on Rules is that the Committee on Rules shall have the right to report at any time—on rules, joint rules, and order of business.

That denominates the privileged character of the rule. It does not denominate the character of the rule, but its privileged character. This is sought to be brought before the House at this time as a privileged rule—that is, with the right to report it at any time—but it is neither a rule nor is it a joint rule, nor does it refer to the order of business. It is constructive; it reports a new rule. It reports something that will require further action of the House. It seems to me that it is quite clear that it can not be within the things that are denominated as privileged, and that the committee has no right to bring in this rule at this time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has just said, this is a new rule; that is what it amounts to. I call the attention of the Chair to section 666 of the General Rules of the House, page 291:

The chairman shall appoint the clerk or clerks or other employees of his committee, subject to its approval, who shall be paid at the public expense, the House having first provided therefor.

The rules of the House do deal with the matter of a clerk. Under the rules of the House, the House must first provide for a clerk before the chairman can appoint one. It seems to me that it would be competent to change the rule in that particular, and it would not destroy the privilege if a rule were introduced changing the rule in that particular and permitting the chairman to appoint.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I find in the compilation of forms, section 931, in the House Manual, for "resolutions providing for investigations" that the form includes the statement that "the expenses incurred shall be paid upon vouchers approved by the chairman," and so forth, out of certain funds. The note with reference to it states that "the provision for payment of expenses out of the contingent fund is more properly made the subject of a separate resolution, which should be considered by the Committee on Accounts, while the portion ordering the investigation is considered by the Committee on Rules. But frequently the Committee on Rules reports on both propositions, although their report in such a case is necessarily subject to a point of order."

The gentleman from Tennessee, it seems to me, was urging this matter of privilege by reason of the fact that necessarily expenditures must be made by such a special committee, and among other expenses would be a clerk. This quotation makes it clear, so far as it may be authority, that general authority for expenditures would not be permitted in a resolution from the Rules Committee if objection were made. If the authorization for general expenditure would not be in order, it seems only reasonable that the expenditure for a clerk could not be authorized by the Rules Committee without making this resolution subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Where is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. CRAMTON. Page 447 of the House Manual, in connection with the form of resolution providing for an investigation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the contention of the gentleman or the members of the Committee on Rules is correct, then they would have the right in this connection to authorize the appointment not only of a clerk but an assistant clerk or any number of secretarial force for that committee they desired.

Mr. SANFORD. Including janitors?

Mr. STAFFORD. Including janitors and messengers; and yet we know that even at this session of Congress, when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of an additional clerk as an assistant to his committee, it was referred to the Committee on Accounts. If his committee had had the right under the rules of the House to appoint a clerk, it would have had the right necessarily to appoint every other kind of official that the committee saw fit to recommend; but under the rules of the House, as interpreted by the Chair and the practice of this House, that privilege has always belonged to the Committee on Accounts. I cite to you, Mr. Speaker, the authority found in Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 4534. Of course, the authority referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], that the chairman appoint the clerk, is not inconsistent with the position taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], that the original authority of appointment vests in the Committee on Accounts. After the Committee on Accounts gives the authority for the appointment of the clerk, then, necessarily, the operating effect of the rule, that the chairman shall appoint, begins. Now, referring to paragraph 4534 of Hinds' Precedents:

An annual clerkship of a committee is authorized by a resolution reported by the Committee on Accounts and agreed to by the House.

That is the heading as framed by Mr. Hinds.

On August 23, 1888, Mr. M. M. Boothman, of Ohio, from the Committee on Accounts, presented for the action of the House this resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries be allowed an annual clerk, to be paid out of the contingent funds of the House, until March 3, 1889, at the rate of $2,000 per annum; and the Committee on Appropriations is hereby instructed to make provision for such clerk at the said rate of $2,000 per annum, from said March 3, 1889."

Mr. Speaker, the mere fact that the Committee on Rules has authority to create a new committee, which is a rule of the House, does not give the committee the right to present a rule providing for a clerkship, for which authority is granted to the Committee on Accounts. That destroys the privileged character of it as pointed out by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. It only has authority and privilege to present resolutions prescribing rules, joint rules, or order of business. It has no authority if the Committee on Accounts has that privilege to authorize a clerk, otherwise it would have had the right the other day to have brought in here a rule providing for an assistant clerk for its own committee. But no, under the interpretation of the rules of the House that resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Well, if the proposition to create an assistant clerk stood by itself, if it stood by itself after this special committee had been created, it would undoubtedly go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. STAFFORD. The mere fact is that time does not affect the character of the authority. The committee not having that authority in the instance given by me as to their own committee would not have authority as a matter of privilege to provide it for some other committee.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, there is one section of Hinds' Precedents that seems to me more in point than any one heretofore cited. That is section 4332. The heading is:

The assignment of committee clerks is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Accounts.

And the paragraph reads:

On December 17, 1869, the House agreed to a resolution that all propositions providing for committee clerks be referred to the Committee on Accounts before being acted on, and this was also the practice in 1877, when the resolutions assigning committee clerks were reported from this committee, and has continued the practice.

The SPEAKER. Now, what does the gentleman conclude?

Mr. MAPES. I conclude that that part of this resolution providing for a committee clerk coming from the Committee on Rules is not in order. That must go to the Committee on Accounts. The Committee on Accounts is the only committee, according to this section, that has jurisdiction over the assignment to or the creation of a clerk for a committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the authority which the gentleman has just cited evidently applies to those cases where clerks are to be provided for committees already in existence, and only to that.

Now, a very learned and witty judge in my State once said that common sense is always good law, though good law may not always be common sense. I think that is true of parliamentary law as well as other law. And what is the common sense of this proposition? Here is a proposition submitted to the House—and the House can determine whether or not it desires to adopt it—to create a special committee. That carries with it by the resolution the authority to appoint a clerk. The committee must have a clerk if it is to be selected. It does not provide the appropriation. The Committee on Accounts will have to attend to that. That is the part of it with which the Committee on Accounts must deal, namely, fixing the compensation of the clerk. This is merely a complete piece of machinery provided in the rule, and why should that not be as a matter of common sense? In the absence of any direct decisions upon the matter, and inasmuch as the Chair must blaze the way, it seems to me——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did not mean to say, Mr. Speaker, that the committee would be entitled to a clerk under the general rules of the House. I do not think so. The committee did not think so, and hence it inserted the provision that it should have a clerk.

Why, Mr. Speaker, if the Chair should hold that that destroys the privileged character of the resolution, let me call attention to future complications that will arise. In almost every Congress there occurs the necessity for creating special committees for this purpose or for that, very often for purposes of investigation.

We have had numerous investigating committees, namely, the Stanley steel committee and the Hardwick sugar committee, the Mulhall committee, investigating the lobby charges, and so forth. In each and every instance the Committee on Rules, in bringing in the resolution providing for the selection of the special committee, has provided that those committees should have the right to employ such clerical and other assistance as they might need, frequently giving the power to employ counsel. Now, if the chair should hold that that is not privileged, see what complications it would bring about in the effort to create even the machinery necessary in the operation of special committees in the future.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Assuming that the provision in the rule authorizing the appointment of a new committee, or a select committee, for the appointment of a clerk or the employment of counsel, would destroy its privileged character, following out the suggestion made by the gentleman that common sense should be good law, is it to be presumed that the Committee on Accounts, which has undoubted authority to provide for the employment or a clerk, or authorize the employment of counsel, would refuse to do its duty in giving to that committee the proper authority?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, I do not think so. The gentleman evidently did not understand what I had in mind. I am simply striving to obtain the simplest methods of reaching a result, and that is the simplest method.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, of course. The simplest method would be to vest the power in the Committee on Rules——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. And deprive the Committee on Accounts of some of its authority.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, not at all. The Committee on Rules is not usurping any authority and could not usurp any authority if it wanted to do so. The Committee on Rules can not do anything except what this House wants it to do. That has been demonstrated several times recently. The matter, I think, is of considerable importance in that it affects the procedure of the House, and this is the plain, simple way to get at the result, which is, of course, desirable. Otherwise you would have to take two or three different bites of the cherry.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I submit one additional observation. It is admitted that the Committee on Rules has the right to present a rule changing the rules of the House. The creation of a new committee is undoubtedly a subject for a privileged report. Now, whatever is necessarily a part of that committee properly comes, I submit, within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules. If it is necessary for that committee to have a clerk, the provision authorizing the employment of such clerk does not destroy the privileged character of the resolution. The question is, Where does the line of demarcation come? Whatever is essential to the creation of the proposed committee properly belongs to the Committee on Rules. Whatever is not essential or necessary destroys the privileged character of a report. An appropriation, it has been held, would destroy such privilege.

But in the creation of a committee, if the Chair shall be of opinion that a clerk is essential and necessary in the work of that committee, then the provision empowering the committee to have such clerk does not destroy privileged character.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman contend that the Committee on Rules could report a rule providing for a disbursement out of the contingent fund?

Mr. POU. I do not.

Mr. SANFORD. Why not, then, if you can bring in any resolution you want changing the rules?

Mr. POU. I have tried to make myself plain. The point I am making is that whatever is essential to the creation of this committee does not deprive the resolution of its privileged character.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman consider this further—does not the gentleman think the payment of a clerk is just as essential as the appointment of a clerk?

Mr. POU. Not in the sense in which I am speaking.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman does not rely on common sense, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] suggested.

Mr. POU. Yes; I rely on parliamentary common sense, and I think the gentleman himself comprehends very clearly the point I make, that if the appointment of a clerk is an essential part of the initial creation of this committee, then it is competent for the Committee on Rules to bring in this provision. That is the point I am making.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge me for the citation of some further authorities, I will call his attention to paragraph 4331 of Hinds' Precedents, bearing on this subject, the heading being, "The Committee on Accounts recommends to the House resolutions authorizing and assigning clerks to committees." I will not read the paragraph following the heading. Paragraph 4332 says:

The assignment of committee clerks is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not that derive entirely out of the general and specific rules of the House that the House must provide for those clerks? And if there is a rule taking it out of the general rules of the House, none of that which the gentleman has read will apply.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the rules of the House to the effect that the House must provide for clerks. I take issue with the position of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that a clerk is absolutely necessary for the performance of the duties of the committee. If that is the fact, then the Committee on Rules would not only have authority to appoint a clerk, but also an assistant clerk, and a janitor, or a messenger, or anything else, and the Committee on Accounts would be deprived of its proper jurisdiction.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman says that the rules of the House do not provide that the House shall make provision for a clerk. Section 5 of Rule X (paragraph 666 of the Manual) does expressly provide that—

> The chairman shall appoint the clerk or clerks or other employees of his committee, subject to its approval, who shall be paid at the public expense, the House having first provided therefor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course; "the House having first provided therefor." It confirms the very position I take—that before there is a clerk to a committee there must be an authorization given by some standing committee for the appointment of that clerk, and the proper committee to appoint that clerk or assistant clerk is the Committee on Accounts; and then, after the authorization is made by the proper committee, which is the Committee on Accounts, the chairman has the authority to appoint the clerk or other subordinate clerks.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman overlooks the fact that the Committee on Rules can report a rule at any time changing the rules of the House in that or any other particular.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, following that construction, the Committee on Rules would have the authority to report a rule at any time changing the rules of the House authorizing expenditures out of the contingent fund. It was contended always that that deprived a resolution of its privileged character, because that was in the exclusive power of the Committee on Accounts.

I direct the attention of the Speaker to the fact that in these prior authorizations, as, for instance, those for investigating committees, while they may have had authorizations providing for the employment of clerks or counsel, the point of order was never tested on the floor of the House. There is nothing to show that that character of legislation was debated in this House.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. It does not pretend to change the rules of the House. The rules of the House still exist, and they provide that propositions shall be reported to the House when new clerks are to be appointed.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is so. I wonder whether this new committee is to be provided with a janitor. If so, could there not be an authorization to appoint a janitor or messenger?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is there not a decided difference in the authority of the Committee on Rules to report to the House a change of rules and to make a report in disregard of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

AMENDMENT TO THE FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT (H. REPT. NO. 237).

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conference report on Senate bill 3235 be presented to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. Has this been printed under the rules?

Mr. GLASS. It is in the RECORD to-day. It is in the RECORD, and it has been acted on by the Senate.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GILLETT. It is printed in the RECORD?

Mr. GLASS. It is printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GILLETT. Is it printed in the House proceedings?

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. GILLETT. Then, under the rule, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it can not be considered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand what the point was.

Mr. GILLETT. That it has not been printed in the House proceedings, under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that we may proceed with the consideration of the conference report and take it from the Speaker's table. The matter has been acted upon by the Senate. The Senate has receded from its disagreement and accepted the House bill in toto.

Mr. GILLETT. I did not know what the House report was. If that is so, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report, the rule to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Virginia if it is the farm-loan bill conference report?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; it is.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What, in substance, is the outline of the report? What did the conferees do?

Mr. GLASS. The Senate receded from its disagreement and accepted the House bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Without the Weeks amendment?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, what time is to be given for the consideration of this conference report?

Mr. GLASS. I did not suppose that anybody would want to speak on it again. The House bill was discussed for three hours under general debate and then under the five-minute rule, and the Senate has accepted the House bill in toto.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The time was very limited. I remember I succeeded in getting three minutes, by a great deal of exertion, when the matter was up before.

Mr. GLASS. If anybody desires further discussion on the matter, I shall raise no objection. The gentleman will recall that the House passed the House amendment by a vote of 3 to 1, and the Senate has now yielded.

Mr. GARNER. I was just going to ask about that. The Senate has yielded to the House amendment?

Mr. GLASS. The Senate has yielded, and has agreed to the conference report.

Mr. GARNER. Then there is nothing else to do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It may be that further discussion is useless, but the matter was not discussed much before.

Mr. GLASS. I agree with the gentleman, and it was largely through my fault.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] rose to the parliamentary inquiry, but he was interrupted.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not understand that this was a conference report, and I merely wanted to ask whether it would destroy the right of the Invalid Pensions Committee to call up its bill.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no. The conference report has the right of way.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand that. As soon as I found that out, I withdrew my point.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3235) amending section 32, Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same.

CARTER GLASS,
MICHAEL F. PHELAN,
EVERIS A. HAYES,
Managers on the part of the House.

ROBERT L. OWEN,
HENRY F. HOLLIS,
A. J. GRONNA,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

FISHING IN THE COLUMBIA RIVER—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the rereference of the bill (H. R. 2617) to ratify the compact and agreement between the States of Oregon and Washington regarding concurrent jurisdiction over the waters of the Columbia River and its tributaries in connection with regulating, protecting, and preserving fish.

This bill was introduced by Mr. HADLEY, of Washington, at the first session of this Congress and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In the last Congress the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] introduced the bill and it was referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and was reported out of that committee and passed by the House. In the opinion of the committee the bill ought to go to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to rerefer the bill to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "of," strike out "$30" and insert "$50."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee on this case shows that the soldier, a veteran of the Civil War, is 73 years of age and has no property or income of any kind, except the pension which he is now receiving. The medical testimony filed with the committee shows that he is "wholly unfitted for manual labor, by reason of asthma, chronic myocarditis, interstitial nephritis, and arteriosclerosis."

I think it will be conceded by everyone that a soldier who is afflicted as the report shows this soldier to be, and who has no property or income, ought to receive more pension than $30 per month. He is now receiving $20 per month, and the committee recommends that he be given $30. He is unable to work and has no property or income of any kind. He certainly can not live on this amount, especially if he has a wife or family dependent upon him for support. Fifty dollars now will not go as far as $30 would a few years ago.

I realize, however, the practical impossibility of getting an item in one of these omnibus pension bills increased on the floor of the House after it has been reported by the committee, and I do not wish anyone to construe what I have to say as in any way being a criticism of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which reports this bill. I appreciate the fact, as everyone else here does, that that committee does good, conscientious work and a lot of it; and I take this opportunity to urge upon the committee to report a bill giving an increase of pension to all the veterans of the Civil War. I believe such a bill would pass the House by an overwhelming majority if the committee would only give us a chance to vote upon it.

There have been several bills introduced in this Congress which are now before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to increase the pensions now being paid to the veterans of the Civil War. Some of them would keep the principle of the age-and-service law but raise the rates as provided therein; others would give all veterans of the Civil War a pension of $50. I believe the committee should promptly report one of these bills.

It is fair to say that practically all of the men who fought in the Civil War are now over 70 years of age and unable to perform manual labor to support themselves. The time has come when the committee, however diligent, can not differentiate between the degrees of helplessness which exist in these old men. They are all helpless; they are all worthy.

The last session of Congress very justly raised the pensions paid to widows of veterans of the Civil War from $12 and $20 to $25 per month. Let us before this session adjourns do complete justice and raise the pensions of the men who actually did the fighting from what they are now receiving to $50 per month or some amount that is just and adequate. [Applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, this is one of 301 cases in this bill. If we undertake to thrash out an amendment to all of these items we will not get anywhere with this legislation. The committee has considered all of these items as best they could in the time they have had to do it. They have tried to do exact justice, and in this case believe it is no exception. The soldier mentioned in this item for whom the increase is asked had a comparatively short service, one year and three months. It is true that he is 70 years of age, but many others in this bill are 80 and 85 years of age. Many cases, it is shown by proof, require the attention of nurses all the time to take care of them, and had a long service in the war. The rules of the committee permit the allowance of $50 in such cases, but they limit special bills to $50. If we allow the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, when there is no proof of needed assistance, it would not be fair to those who have served longer, who are more helpless, who are older, and who need the assistance of an attendant all the time. So there would be a disparity and a partiality shown unless you increase all others. I hope the House will not encourage an amendment of this sort. We invite Members of the House who have bills to come before the committee. We try to treat everybody fairly and do not discriminate against anyone if we know it, and did not do so in this case. If I am correctly informed and understand the facts of the case, the soldier referred to in this amendment lives in Missouri and not in Michigan. He is not a resident of the district represented by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] but is in the district represented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], who is satisfied with the amount which is allowed. He is asking for no amendment, and it will be manifestly improper for the House to vote an amendment for this man in view of all the proof, in view of all the facts, and in view of the fact that the author is satisfied with the action and recommendation of the committee. I ask all of those who are interested in getting liberal pensions for the old soldiers who need them to stand by this committee as the proper way to get the best and the most adequate relief. I hope the House will vote down this amendment.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the pending amendment proposes to increase the pension of one of the proposed beneficiaries in this bill from $30 per month, as reported by the committee, to $50 per month. The soldier is now pensioned at the rate of $20 per month. The committee recommends that his pension be increased to $30. He is shown to be unable to perform manual labor and to own no property and to be entirely without any other income or means of support except his pension. He is not helpless and does not require the aid or assistance of another person in caring for himself. Under the rules of the Committee on Invalid Pensions $30 per month is the limit of allowance in cases of this kind. Personally I would be in favor of allowing a greater rate, but it would be unfair to do so in this case unless, at the same time, we grant similar increases in all other cases. If the House thinks we should be more liberal and go beyond the rate prescribed by the rules, the committee would like to be advised of that fact. We have a very large number of such cases as this before the committee, and we try to treat all alike, and we think no case should be singled out for an increase above the rates allowed by the committee under the rules, unless it is the desire of the Members of the House that all Civil War pensions should be increased. I have myself introduced a bill providing for an increase of pensions by general law, in cases like this, to $50 per month, and I would like to see that bill, or some general bill, enacted at this session of Congress to increase all pensions of Civil War veterans who are now receiving or entitled to pensions of less than $50 per month. I am not particular whether it is my bill or some other bill, but I would like to see a general increase all along the line. The same arguments now being made for increase of pay to Government employees apply equally to the matter of the pensions of the old soldiers. The country owes them much. They saved this Union. We can afford to treat them justly and generously. As everyone knows, the cost of living and of all the necessities of life have increased enormously in the last few years. In the case of an old soldier who is destitute, who owns no property, and has no income aside from his pension, $30 per month is wholly inadequate for his support, and where he has a wife or children dependent upon him for support the amount is ridiculously inadequate. I think that by a general bill we should grant pensions of $50 per month in all such cases, thus doing away with the necessity of passing so many special pension bills. Thousands of cases which the committee never hears of are as deserving as any of those reported by the committee, and relief should be granted in all such cases.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Would not the gentleman favor an amendment of the rule until his bill is passed upon by Congress in order to allow deserving men a larger pension than the rule admits?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I would be in favor of allowing a larger amount in all cases where the pensioner is without means of support other than his pension and is virtually in a helpless condition.

Mr. DOWELL. Would not the gentleman be in favor of the committee amending the rule under the circumstances?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I would like to know how the House feels on that.

Mr. DOWELL. It is a committee rule and not a rule of the House. Why can not the committee amend it?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I am in favor of a larger amount, but I am in the minority on that committee.

The example set by these old veterans of the Civil War is worth untold millions in the present emergency. Their devotion to duty, their patriotism, their deeds of valor on many a hard-fought battle field form many of the brightest pages in the history of this free Government and are an inspiration to the patriotic young men of this generation who are to-day fighting for the liberation of mankind from the yoke of tyranny, autocracy, and frightfulness. As the Government cares for its old soldiers, their widows and orphans, so may the young patriots of to-day know that they and their loved ones will be cared for in the coming days when the present great conflict is over and when the shadows lengthen in their declining years. We are appropriating vast sums to carry on the war in which we are now engaged, and we have pledged, if necessary, all the resources of this great Nation, and we shall make good. We shall win the war at whatever cost, that the lives and liberties of those who are to come after us may be safeguarded on land and sea, safe from attacks by an outlaw nation or a murderous military autocracy led by ambitious scoundrels who recognize no law of humanity, of justice, or of right.

But while the present and the future problems demand our undivided attention, let us not forget to do justice to those who carried our flag to victory, who made our country great and free, whose fighting days are over, but whose example will spur on to victory our national armies now engaged or about to engage in the most titanic struggle in all the world's history. A few more years and the last veteran of that grand Army of the Union will have passed away. Any aid we can give them in the few remaining years they are to be with us should be given promptly, cheerfully, and as matter of justice and right. Compared with other appropriations we are making the cost will not be great, and in this case, if in no other, there should be no cheeseparing. In these days of the Nation's supreme trial let it be known as the settled policy of the Government that the Nation's defenders shall ever be held in sacred remembrance, and that they and their dependents shall always be entitled to and shall receive the first consideration of the Government which they risked their lives to save and perpetuate.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I formerly served on the Committee on Invalid Pensions under Gen. SHERWOOD, with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], and I learned certain things there. One of them is that you are bound in that committee by certain rules of action. Necessarily so, and the provision in the item under consideration is in accordance with those rules. I also learned then what I am sure is the case now, that members of that committee are disposed to do everything possible for the old soldiers and the widows.

I am, therefore, not speaking from the standpoint of criticism of the work of the committee, but rather by reason of the expression of the gentleman from Illinois, Judge FULLER, asking for something in respect to the sentiment of the House. I do not think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] offered this amendment with a view to this item alone, but rather as a precedent, which would be followed in other items in the bill, and in view of such action by the House then the committee would probably make some change in their rules and perhaps give the greater consideration to more generous general legislation, since the committee, I am sure, does desire to know and to do what the House desires.

Since we have provided that the widows are to receive $25 a month as a pension, it is not consistent that a veteran of the Civil War who served a year and four months should receive only $20, when that man may have not only himself to support, as would be the case of a widow, but a wife to support.

Further, I know that the principle that moves the Committee on Invalid Pensions and this House is that they do not desire that in their old age the veterans who rendered good service in the crisis of a half century ago, or their widows after they are gone, shall starve or go to the poorhouse or be the objects of private charity, but that they will get sufficient pension to keep them out of the poorhouse. Two or three years ago $30 would do that, but if that old veteran has a wife living with him, how can they live on $30 a month in these times?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. What does the gentleman say about this situation? We all understand, of course, that we can not get a special bill through the Senate that provides for a higher rate than $50 a month. If you raise a case like this to $50, where an attendant is not needed, as the evidence discloses, would that be just to that class of cases where the soldier is shown to be helpless and to require the constant aid and attendance of another person? The gentleman seems to be inclined himself to the proposition of general pension legislation raising the rate, and with that I am in hearty accord, but I do not think his position is consistent on this case.

Mr. CRAMTON. The most we have in mind—and I think that is all my colleague from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has in mind, is to give to the Committee on Invalid Pensions an idea of the sentiment of the House——

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; that is what I want to know, and I am glad to note these evidences of a liberal sentiment toward the old soldiers. I have a bill proposing a much higher rate for all of them.

Mr. CRAMTON (continuing). That the committee may realize that we have need for legislation, and that it will report legislation such as the House wants.

Mr. LANGLEY. Exactly.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. If we should give the soldier affected by this amendment $50 under the proof filed before the committee, does the gentleman from Michigan believe that that will be sufficient, then, for those who served three or four times as long and are a great deal older and more helpless and need a nurse all of the time?

Mr. CRAMTON. So far as keeping out of the poorhouse is concerned, I am just as anxious to keep out of the poorhouse the man who served a year and four months as the man who served three or four years. It is not a question now based on age and service, although I think that age and service act ought to have considerable amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does not the gentleman appreciate that a man who is bedfast or who is totally blind ought to have more money than a man who is not bedfast or who is not totally blind or who does not need any nurse?

Mr. CRAMTON. If the man gave good service and is now without property, without other income than his pension, I would favor this Congress giving him, whether he be bedfast or not, a sufficient pension to enable him to live and support his wife, if he has one, without taking private charity. If the committee finds that $50 will not do that in the case of a man who is bedfast, then it should make it more than $50.

Mr. RUSSELL. What limit would the gentleman recommend?

Mr. CRAMTON. Sufficient to keep them out of the poorhouse and from the necessity for receiving private charity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, as a member of this committee I would like to express my views on the point raised by the gentleman who desires to amend the report. The gentleman's statement that he is willing to give $50 to any man who served, regardless of the length of service, if he is unable to support himself, meets a responsive chord in my heart. I am in entire harmony with that statement. I do not think that $50, the limit that we are allowed to give by the rule of the committee, is sufficient in the case of total disability, where a nurse is required. Neither do I think that $30 is enough for anyone who is totally incapable of performing manual labor. I do not think $30 is enough for the support of a soldier who has reached the age most Civil War Veterans have attained, regardless of the length of service; but those are the rules as established by the committee. If we take out a single exception, it means that it will be in each instance criticized and corrected by this Congress and result in unequal and unfair discriminations among these old fellows, most of whom are entitled to the tenderest and most generous and impartial consideration from this Government. The real remedy would be a new general bill, general legislation covering that point.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. In a minute. I am in entire sympathy with the sentiment expressed by the gentleman who preceded me, in which he asks for more liberal pensions for soldiers of the Civil War, and I know there is a large sentiment in this Congress in favor of a bill coming out of this committee favoring a higher rate for all soldiers, so that we will not be required by special act in each instance to come before Congress and petition for enough money for the soldier to live on, and as a member of the committee I will vote to favorably report such a bill. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Until such a bill is presented, is not the real remedy to amend the committee rule?

Mr. BLAND. I think so, absolutely, but not to amend the bill that was drawn under the rule; but what we need is a new general law.

Mr. DOWELL. It seems to me the committee should do that, and not attempt to control the House when it attempts to raise the amount.

Mr. BLAND. As has just been said, the gentleman will run up against the proposition of getting this bill, if amended as suggested, through at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. DOWELL. That is their responsibility, not ours.

Mr. BLAND. We are trying, in the most practical way, to give relief to the old soldiers as well as we can under the circumstances.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BLAND. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. And that is that the Committee on Invalid Pensions is going to take up at an early date the question of reporting a general measure affecting the situation we are now discussing, and, if the gentleman will pardon me further, I think that any attempt here to raise rates beyond what we know the Senate will approve will only delay this legislation, because it will involve amendments and thrashing it out in conference later on.

Mr. BLAND. The question raised here by the gentleman's proposed amendment merely emphasizes the fact that there is universal demand for a pension law for the Civil War soldiers, and for all other soldiers of other wars, for that matter, that is reasonable in amount but sufficient to take care of the needs of those men who are suffering. I think this debate emphasizes this fact, and I know that there are certain bills which have been presented, one by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL], which is before this committee now, and other bills of a similar character, by which they are seeking to raise the general rate for the old soldier. I am heartily in sympathy with such effort, but at present, when gentlemen ask you to override the rules of this committee and show partiality in favor of some, I say it will result in giving some a higher rate than others who are equally deserving. Take, for instance, my grandfather's captain, whose pension is increased in this bill; he is 85 years of age. He is totally helpless; he has to have an attendant; and $50, the limit under the rules, is not enough. Another soldier, a constituent from my district, is in here who is absolutely in need, in want, who, under this bill, gets only $30 a month. I insisted that they get the limit of their class under the rules, but I have no quarrel with my committee because they have treated these constituents the same as others in their class. Until the House shall express by vote its wishes, or require a voting out of this committee, a general law to aid the old soldiers you can not get much relief. It only causes a fight at the other end of this Capitol if you exceed the rules of our committee.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Speaker, as the debate has taken a general character, I wish to say a few words at this time. I will gladly vote for the pending bill, but it seems to me that the time is at hand when on account of the necessitous circumstances of something like 300,000 Civil War veterans now on the pension roll that there is a pressing demand on this Congress to pass, and speedily pass, a general law that will increase the rates of pension of such soldiers drawing $55 and less per month. I am not wedded to any particular rate. I do not know that I am wedded to the particular line of demarcation that I have mapped out, but in the closing days of the last session this House, by a large vote, and the Senate passed a law increasing the pension of the Civil War widows, giving them from $12 to $25 and from $20 to $25 a month. Why? Because this House determined here after days and days of deliberation that it required $25 a month to support a young widow of a soldier who was killed or died from injuries or disease contracted in the present war. If that is true, of course it follows that the mothers of the soldiers of the present war, who are widows of soldiers of former wars, should have $25 per month. Now, what is the situation? Here is an anomalous condition. We have to-day upon the pension roll fewer than 100,000 Civil War veterans drawing more than $25 a month. There were more than 200,000 Civil War veterans drawing less than $25 a month July 1, 1917, as shown by the last report of the Commissioner of Pensions. The men who faced the shot and shell and endured the hardships of the conflict drawing less than $25. One of the first men to enlist from my home county and who served four years, by a special act draws only $24 a month to-day. I have a bundle of petitions here asking that these pensions be increased, not only from old soldiers but from other citizens of my district. One petition is signed by 73 Civil War veterans of one county, and only 2 are 69, 4 are 70, and the remaining 67 are away beyond 70 years of age, and this Congress having meted out a fair measure of justice to the Civil War widows, it should not hesitate to do what is right by these old veterans. The woman who married a Civil War soldier 30 years after the war, much younger than these soldiers here petitioning for relief to-day, when he dies draws $25 a month, but while living as man and wife only $24, $20, $17, and less in many cases is received for the support of both. This is the absurd situation in which we find ourselves, and it seems to me the Committee on Invalid Pensions—I do not want to criticize them—ought to get to work quickly and report out a bill increasing most of the present rates. I have introduced a bill, I am not particularly wedded to it, asking an increase of 40 per cent for all drawing under $30, 33⅓ per cent for all those drawing $30 and under $40, and 20 per cent for those drawing $40 and not over $55, and that when a soldier reaches 76 years of age he be given no pension of less than $40 a month and no pension shall be given less than $30 a month. The last rate might be reduced, but no soldier who served 3, 6, 9, 12 months or 2 years ought to receive less than his widow receives on account of his death.

True, our resources are being heavily taxed and burdened with large obligations which must be defrayed in the future, but I do not believe we have reached that degree of financial depression that makes it necessary to be neglectful of the pressing needs of the survivors of that grand army which by its heroic efforts from '61 to '65 preserved the Union and made it possible to have a mighty American Republic to wage the great world battle for human liberty to-day.

Omnibus bills carrying increases for a few hundred or a few thousand cases will not suffice, and it is urgent that a general law be enacted substantially increasing the pensions of 200,000 of the 300,000 Civil War veterans now on the pension roll drawing less than $25 per month, practically all of whom have outlived the allotted three score years and ten and who are not only handicapped by the infirmities accompanying old age but who are also pinched by the high cost of living now prevailing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Felix Karl, late of Company B, One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill by striking out lines 7 to 10, inclusive, on page 25, his bill having been passed previously.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. Is he contemplating taking steps to have hearings on or to report out any general law for increase in the rate of pensions?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will state that there have been a number of general bills offered proposing to increase pensions of soldiers and they are pending before the committee. No time has yet been fixed for the hearing on those bills, but I presume the chairman of the committee, Gen. SHERWOOD, will call a meeting for that purpose, when such bills will be properly considered. I will not undertake to state what the action of the committee will be. Personally I realize that with the present high cost of living the soldiers deserve more, especially many who are poor and helpless.

Mr. SWITZER. I thank the chairman.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same thing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Robert Stevenson, late of Company F, Sixty-ninth Regiment New York State Militia, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to amend, on page 42, line 2, by adding after the word "Militia" the word "Infantry." As it is, it is a clerical error.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment indicated will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Edwin Downs, late of Company E, Nineteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry (Heavy Artillery), and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to amend, on page 45, at line 18, by inserting in the bracket, before the word "Heavy," the word "Second." It is a typographical error. I want it to read "Second Heavy Artillery."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUSSELL: Page 45, line 18, after the bracket, before the word "Heavy," insert "Second."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Ann Diltz, widow of William H. Diltz, late of Company —, One hundred and ninety-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to amend, on page 46, at line 5, by striking out the word "Company" and the comma. It is a mistake of the Printing Office.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUSSELL: Page 46, line 5, after the word "of," strike out the word "Company" and the comma.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of John P. Hodgkins, late of the Second Independent Battery Massachusetts Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to amend, on page 46, line 18, by striking out the figures "30" and inserting "36." This is not an increase to be made on the floor, but is a typographical error which ought to be corrected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 18, after the word "of," strike out the numerals "30" and insert in lieu thereof "36."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of William Hummer, late of Company H, Sixteenth Regiment, and Company I, One hundred and fourteenth Regiment, Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to amend the bill on page 49, at the end of line 3, by striking out the two character letters and inserting the letter "H" instead. As it is now, it is a roman two.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUSSELL: Page 49, line 3, strike out "II" and insert in lieu thereof the letter "H."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WATER-POWER COMMITTEE.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I offer by direction of the Committee on Rules a privileged report, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. By special order I have been given leave to address the House after the disposition of the omnibus pension bill, which has just been disposed of. Does that order stand after this rule is disposed of, or do I waive my right?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it stands. This is the way of it: Whether the Chair put it that way or not, it is the way it ought to be put always as to these special orders, namely, not to interfere with privileged matters. That order was made, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman as soon as we can get through with this.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 220 (H. Rept. No. 238).

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a special committee of 18 members to whom all bills and resolutions hereafter introduced during the Sixty-fifth Congress pertaining to the development or utilization of water power shall be referred (notwithstanding any general rule of the House to the contrary), except, however, bills and resolutions of which the Committee on Foreign Affairs has jurisdiction under the general rules of the House.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be, and it is hereby, discharged from further consideration of H. R. 3808, H. R. 7695, H. R. 4504, H. R. 8005, and S. 1419, and said bills are hereby referred to the special committee herein provided for; that the Committee on Public Lands is discharged from further consideration of H. R. 7227, and the same is hereby referred to the special committee aforesaid.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I shall submit a very few observations concerning the resolution now under consideration, and I shall be glad then to yield to other gentlemen who know more about the history of this matter than I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman intend to yield some time to our side?

Mr. POU. I do. I mean that there is no purpose on my part to attempt to cut off reasonable debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Can we have an agreement to that effect?

Mr. POU. I believe under the rules I am entitled to an hour, and I will yield from that hour as fairly as I can.

Mr. LENROOT. You will yield to this side?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to make some remarks against the resolution.

Mr. POU. I will be glad to have the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] control 30 minutes of the hour.

It is well known to the membership of this House, Mr. Speaker, that there has been controversy with respect to water-power legislation for a long time. It is extremely desirable from many standpoints that action be taken by this Congress to the end that the immense water power of this country which is now being wasted shall be made available.

The rule, which was unanimously reported by the Committee on Rules, provides for the creation of a committee of 18. No limitation is placed upon the Speaker in the selection of this committee, because of that unanimous confidence which is entertained on both sides of this Chamber in the Speaker of this House. I will state that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Committee on the Public Lands, the Committee on Agriculture, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors are entirely in harmony with the proposal to create the new committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it proposed to make this committee up from the four committees named?

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman from Washington such a suggestion has been made; but, as I said, there is no requirement in the rule as to where the membership of this committee shall be taken from.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But there is an understanding as to where they shall be taken from?

Mr. POU. There has been no understanding, because nobody has authority to enter into any agreement or understanding. I can simply say this to the gentleman that——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Did not the gentleman just say there was an understanding?

Mr. POU. No. The matter has been discussed by these respective committees, and the committees that I have named are entirely in harmony with this proposed procedure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Did not the Committee on the Public Lands meet this morning and designate five of its members to be members of that committee?

Mr. POU. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I asked if the Committee on the Public Lands met this morning and designated five of its members to be members of this new committee?

Mr. POU. I am informed that the Committee on the Public Lands did not take that action. I am informed that the Committee on the Public Lands had no meeting this morning at all, and that it has taken no action along the lines indicated by the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The whole thing seems rather nebulous. But the statement was made to me that they had agreed upon the three majority members and the two ranking members of the Committee on the Public Lands to be members of that committee.

Mr. POU. That binds nobody.

Mr. LENROOT. The Committee on the Public Lands has taken no such action.

Mr. POU. If it had, it would bind nobody.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. GILLETT. I would not bind anybody unless there was such an understanding as would be binding and which the Speaker would be aware of. I understand there was such an understanding. There is no impropriety in it, but I think it ought to be known whether there was or not.

Mr. POU. I am going to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts this: There is no disposition to conceal anything. When this matter was before the Committee on Rules it was suggested that the new committee should be made up of gentlemen taken from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has had to do with this legislation; from the Committee on Public Lands, some gentlemen on that committee having devoted years of study to this question; and that the Committee on Agriculture should have representation on it, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors also. That was discussed, and all that the Committee on Rules did was to provide a membership large enough so that if the Speaker of this House, after consultation, decided to take representation from those committees, he could do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has it not been stated that it is proposed to make up this committee of 5 members from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and 5 members of the Committee on the Public Lands, making 10 members out of the proposed 18, and that it has been so designated on purpose, so that the members of those two committees would have control?

Mr. POU. I have heard the suggestion made that that would be a proper way to constitute the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And yet it is declared there has been no agreement or arrangement.

Mr. POU. I have heard the suggestion that, inasmuch as the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has had to do with this legislation, and inasmuch as the Committee on Public Lands is interested in it and has heretofore considered similar legislation, those committees should be more largely represented on this committee than any other committees of the House. But that is a question for the Speaker to determine when he comes to name the membership of this committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In these discussions that the gentleman has had, of course, it is understood that those men will still retain their positions on the other committees?

Mr. POU. I can not say that there has been any such understanding. This has all been talk that binds nobody. It has been merely a suggestion as to how it would be wise and proper for the Speaker to make up this committee, having in view harmony and early action. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask the gentleman whether the two existing committees which will be largely distributed, whether those committees have had opportunity to give consideration to the proposed changes?

Mr. POU. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Committee on the Public Lands have considered the proposal of the creation of the new committee, and, as I said before, as I understand it, they are entirely in harmony with the proposal.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is it designed to make this a permanent committee?

Mr. POU. No; just for the life of this Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If this committee takes hold of this nameless bill, without even a number, that provides a $10,000 head of a commission and makes other appropriations of money, is it not likely that that committee will stay on to look after it?

Mr. COX. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. POU. So far as I am personally concerned, I will say to the gentleman that I see no reason why we should not pass a water-power bill during this Congress, and I see no reason for the continuance of this committee after the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why not come out in the open with the Members of this House and say that there here is a bill introduced, without even a number——

Mr. POU. It has not been introduced.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Printed as if it were a bill, though, and marked "Confidential," and that erased, a proposed water-power bill, introduced by no one, and that this bill is proposed to be reported out of this combination committee for the express purpose of blocking the bill which has been passed in another body.

Mr. POU. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It must be.

Mr. POU. I could not assent to that proposition at all. So far as the bill which the gentleman has there is concerned, it was printed simply for the information of the Members of the House and for the consideration of the new committee if the House should see fit to vote for the establishment of that committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This confidential print, or whatever it is, is not available in the document room.

Mr. POU. I will state to my friend that I stated the other day on the floor of the House that the Committee on Rules had had 1,000 copies printed, and that any gentleman who desired to get a copy could either send to the office of the Committee on Rules or to the desk over there. I had a big batch of them put over there on the desk to the left of the Speaker for universal distribution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I made strenuous efforts at the document room, without success.

Mr. POU. It was not in the document room. I made that announcement the other day.

Mr. STAFFORD. I recognize that in the resolution before the House there is a departure, for the first time I believe since the Democrats obtained control of the House, in the method of appointing this special committee, a return to the old method, authorizing the appointment by the Speaker, which was so severely criticized by the Democrats and which resulted so largely in the Democrats getting control of the House. I am not here at this time to criticize the method, because in those days I believed and still believe in the appointment of the committees of the House by the Speaker with some limitations, but as it was a cardinal principle of the Democratic faith when they gained control of the House to have the committees appointed by a committee on committees, I would like to inquire what is the reason for the departure in this instance?

Mr. POU. In answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin I will say that there has been no departure. The rules of the House provide that all special committees shall be appointed by the Speaker. This is a special committee. We are simply following the general rules of the House. There is no change in the rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield further, while it is in a sense a special committee, every one knows that it is going to be a regular committee so far as this Congress is concerned, and that it will continue perhaps in succeeding Congresses. Under the rules of the House the Speaker has the right to appoint such special committees as committees of conference, and I am not questioning for one moment the power that should be given to the present Speaker, but you are departing from the rule which you adopted and going back to the practice which you criticized in the old days by vesting the power in one man to appoint a committee that will report important legislation.

Mr. POU. Oh, well, Mr. Speaker, that is an observation which I do not think requires any further answer than a repetition of what I said a moment ago—that the general rules of the House provide that special committees shall be named by the Speaker, and that this is a special committee. That is all I have to say about it, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to me a few minutes to make a statement in connection with this legislation?

Mr. POU. Yes. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. SIMS. Not over three or four minutes.

Mr. POU. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to state for the information of the House, as far as I know, how this matter came about.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, ever since I have known anything about the matter, have had jurisdiction of bills concerning the construction of bridges and dams over navigable waters of the United States within the States. The Committee on the Public Lands have had jurisdiction of legislation relating to dams on the public lands of the United States. It appears that the Committee on Agriculture have jurisdiction of so much of the public lands as are embraced in forest reserves. For several years there have been attempts to pass a bill authorizing the building of dams on navigable streams, and I think the bill has been passed twice in the House. I know it was passed at the last session. That bill was reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It was acted on by the House and amended on the floor of the House. The bill was a substitute for a Senate bill, and after the House passed it it went to conference, and the conferees failed to agree. Now, it has been suggested, from a source that perhaps many of you will surmise without my stating in terms, that in order to bring about uniform legislation with reference to the building of dams for water-power purposes, both on the forest reserves, on the public lands, and in navigable streams in the States, the Secretary of War, who has jurisdiction of dams on navigable streams within the States, and the Secretary of the Interior, who has jurisdiction of the public lands, and the Secretary of Agriculture who has jurisdiction of the public lands in the forest reserves, should unite in preparing a bill creating a commission out of the three secretaries, and providing legislation exactly similar for the construction of dams on all navigable rivers, and that a bill be introduced and passed dealing with the whole subject.

Mr. GILLETT. That is what I was going to ask the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. And in order to do that it was suggested—not by myself, for I knew nothing about it—that a rule be brought in authorizing the creation of a committee of three or five members from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, three or five members from the Committee on Public Lands, and the same number from the Committee on Agriculture.

When the matter was submitted to me and to five or six members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I suggested that I would not agree to it without submitting it to the full committee. I did submit it to the full committee, and the committee voted unanimously to agree to such a rule, but it was to be a special committee having jurisdiction of the legislation proposed during the present session of Congress and no further or otherwise. Of course, being a special committee of limited life and jurisdiction it was to be appointed by the Speaker of the House. I think I have stated substantially all the facts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Where does it state in the resolution that this is to be a limited committee, or limited in time?

Mr. SIMS. It is a special committee.

Mr. POU. The committee can only continue during this Congress.

Mr. SIMS. I would not agree to a permanent committee of that kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Could Congress authorize a committee for any longer time than this Congress?

Mr. FOSTER. This says a special committee.

Mr. LENROOT. If the gentleman will allow me to make a suggestion, the next Congress adopting the rules of this Congress would not include this committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Could it not very well incorporate a provision authorizing this committee continued?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. The next Congress would have to act specifically on this proposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would take a special order the same as the old pension orders were.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Committee on Rules brought in a rule providing that the rules of the present Congress should be adopted for that Congress, together with this special committee, it would be continued.

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen are out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield 30 minutes to this side?

Mr. POU. Yes. I stated that the gentleman from Wisconsin was to control 30 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I hope Members will give attention to what is coming off in the Congress of the United States. Behind this innocent-looking resolution for a special committee is a bill without a name and without an introducer. The bill is ready with which it is proposed to block the bill S. 1419. If it is necessary to pass this proposed bill, which is all ready, indexed and reported upon by three Secretaries—and I wish I had time to read the report—if it is thought necessary by the Executive that this bill should be passed, why go through this rigmarole and red tape in the appointment of a rubber-stamp committee? Why not pass the bill at once without appointing a special committee and a clerk?

Mr. SIMS. There is no clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There will be a clerk sooner or later. Why not pass the bill in five minutes? Here it is cut and dried. Here is the report of the three Secretaries. The committee will send the bill down to the Secretaries, who will report favorably, then it will go on the calendar, and it will go through this House, actually making rubber stamps out of the new committee and of the membership of the House as well. Here we have the order of three Secretaries, the President favors it, so why have Congress do anything now than O. K. it and let it go? Why not do it in five minutes and have it over with? It is not designed to go into a full discussion of water-power legislation, because your bill is ready and all other bills will be laid on the table.

Mr. SIMS. But we will have the power to amend it or offer a substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is not likely that any amendment or substitute will be adopted with three Secretaries favoring a bureaucratic bill that has been written over in the departments for the express purpose of outwitting the Senate of the United States and making the House of Representatives the tool with which to do it. What does the bill propose? A special commissioner at a salary of $10,000 and a secretary at $5,000 a year, and so on. Just one more commission! Just one more arm of Congress which will be stronger than Congress itself. The bill is bureaucratic, written by bureau chiefs and indorsed by three Secretaries. It gives no western States any hand in the control of the water power within their confines and no share in any of the returns. It fixes it so that a western State having a Federal domain of 50 per cent will remain forever in that position. The leases are renewable and the revenue is to go to the Federal Government and not to the States. It provides in a recapture clause that the Government may take over at the end of 50 years the water-power plant and pay only the original cost of it. Will that invite the capital which the West needs? I know half a dozen places, one in particular in the State of Washington, where if the water power can be developed a city of 100,000 people will develop in 10 years. Twenty thousand men can make fortunes there, but a water-power bill which offers only 6 per cent to those who might invest twenty-five to thirty million dollars will not invite capital under the terms of this bill. I have not time to discuss water-power legislation, however, but simply desire to call attention that this is a cut-and-dried proposition, a cut-and-dried membership committee, a bill prepared for it, and the House of Representatives has nothing to do but to put on the rubber stamp of approval.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We have been trying for many years to get water-power legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is no reason why Congress should abrogate its powers any further.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it not desirable from the gentleman's standpoint to at least make some move toward getting legislation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not if it is necessary for Congress to adopt a bill made outside, printed in advance, and a committee named in advance——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, that is aside from the question; the gentleman is speaking against the adoption of the rule. The whole purpose of the rule is to try to bring about a condition in which legislation can be considered, no matter from what source it may come.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Could not a bill come out of a properly constituted committee, as did the Ferris bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Water-power legislation has been tied up for years. We have not gotten anywhere, and though this may be a feeble stagger, we are making an effort.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Suppose we abdicate to the bureaus on every proposition on which the House and the Senate fail to agree—have some chief write a bill and bring it down here with instructions to pass it. I hope that Congress will open its eyes as to what it is doing. It is ceasing to be a coordinate branch of the Government. This nameless, numberless bill, this hybrid report of the three Secretaries, and this special resolution for an especially selected committee are the final proofs.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing mysterious about what has happened, and there is nothing to wound the feelings of the gentleman from Washington or anyone else. The facts are these: The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, headed by Judge SIMS, has jurisdiction over a portion of the water power of the country, about 28 per cent. The Committee on the Public Lands has jurisdiction over about 72 per cent. Each committee has been trying to do its duty and give an adequate water-power policy to the country, so that 30,000,000 horsepower of hydroelectric energy might not every year find its way to the sea, idle and totally wasted. Members of these committees have endeavored to bring this about, and each time we have failed. Twice, step by step, under the closest scrutiny of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and with leaders on this side, the House has passed a bill without a dissenting vote. That bill bore my name, was worked out by the committee, and indorsed by the department. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has had similar experiences with their bill, for it failed each time to get through the Senate. Three departments of the Government had jurisdiction over the water-power bill; the War Department and the Board of Army Engineers, having jurisdiction over navigable streams, have 28 per cent of the water power within their jurisdiction. The Interior Department and the Agricultural Department, in the public lands and forest reserves, have about 72.6 per cent of the water power of the country under their jurisdiction. Each has struggled with the policy it thought was right, neither was able to bring here a composite plan that would be acceptable to the Senate. Those three Secretaries—Mr. Baker, Mr. Lane, and Mr. Houston—very properly, as I believe, came together and formulated a bill which they think provides an adequate water-power policy for this country. I do not now place detailed approval on it, but think it essentially correct in principle.

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, as I believe, very properly passed unanimously a resolution agreeing to come in and try to create a new committee made up of these committees that would agree upon some adequate policy. The Committee on the Public Lands, of which I am a member, did the same thing. Both committees are here asking that this be done, and the Rules Committee, very properly I think, has brought in a rule providing for this procedure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Which committee of those is the one that considered and brought about this particular bill which it is proposed to submit?

Mr. FERRIS. So far as I am concerned, there is absolutely no secret about this matter, and I am glad to advise the gentleman that the three Cabinet officers who are to ultimately administer the policy have taken the initiative and have brought in a bill to us which we can dissect and work over and finally prepare. There is nothing mysterious about that. On the contrary, it is a very great help.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A bill that they indorsed and asked Congress to pass.

Mr. FERRIS. No; they did not. They are trying to help, and they are helping. We need their help, and I am sure help will be welcomed from verey source.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not it is a fact that this bill that is now presented by the Secretary does or does not embody the principles of the Ferris bill that have been indorsed by the House.

Mr. FERRIS. I was going to get to that. If I may, in the short time that I have, I want to say that it is not a moot question as to what are the real essentials of a proper water-supply policy. I think both sides of this Chamber are committed to the essential characteristics and elements of a correct water-power policy, and I shall go over hurriedly what are embodied in this tentative or proposed bill. They are taken from the best in the bill of the Public Lands Committee and the bill from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. There are 10 essentials which this proposed bill embodies.

First. No legislation, Executive order, or department ruling should permit the patenting or the title in fee to pass out of the Federal Government under any conditions. The fee title should be reserved in perpetuity to the United States.

This bill carries such a provision.

Second. The dam sites should be leased for a period of time not longer than 50 years, without any entangling alliances or phrases difficult to understand, on which the courts might quibble or debate as to the relative rights of the Federal Government and the lessee after the term has expired.

Third. The recapture provision should provide that all nonperishable property, such as land, water rights, dam sites, good will, and so forth, should go back to the Federal Government at actual cost, and that all perishable property in connection with the plant should come back to the Federal Government at the end of the lease at its fair value. In both cases the interest of the public is conserved and made certain.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why do we not just pass this bill now?

Mr. FERRIS. No one asks the gentleman to do that, no one asks the committee to do that, no Cabinet officer asks to do that, and no Member of the House would do that. They merely suggest it, and we are to pick it to pieces and make it over, and the gentleman will help do it, for he knows a good deal about water power.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to help do it, but I understand the committee is already selected.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not want to make a misstatement of fact. The committee is not selected. No one knows that better than the Speaker. I dare say the Speaker has not now made up his mind as to a single Member of that committee. I certainly have not suggested a name to him, and I do not believe Judge SIMS has suggested a name to him. I do not believe the chairman of the Committee on Rules has suggested a name to him, and I doubt if he has a name in his mind. So I know the gentleman does not want to muddy the water with that.

Fourth. Strong, clear, well-understood provisions should be inserted in the lease contract for the revocation of the permit for a violation of the conditions thereof.

Fifth. Provisions should be inserted in the lease requiring diligence and prompt construction of the plant so that the property may not be held for speculative purposes.

Every bill that is adopted by this House ought to have a clause providing for diligence in the construction of water-power plants, so that they might not hold them in cold storage and thereby increase the grasp which the water-power monopoly now has.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Has this bill any provision by which the Government itself may develop any of these water powers for governmental purposes?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think it has. I have not examined it critically, but I do not think it has.

Sixth. A royalty or rental for the use of dam sites and the property of the Federal Government should be required in all cases except for municipalities which furnish current to consumers without profit.

Royalty or tax or payment or rental, or whatever you call it, ought to be contained in every bill, so that this Congress may not be subject to the indictment and the charge that we are giving away 35,000,000 hydroelectric horsepower energy of this country. That has been one of the main controversies between the House and the Senate. They have contended all along that if we put any sort of tax, any sort of charge, on water power, we never would have any development.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will permit, in view of the gentleman's statement that there is no provision whereby the Government can utilize this water power itself, are not we proposing to grant away a great asset of the people comparable to coal and minerals of various kinds?

Mr. FERRIS. We do not grant away a thing. The Government retains fee title of every water-power site and every power site in this country. It does not grant away a single horsepower of hydroelectric energy. We merely lease it for a term of years and charge them for the right to use it. We grant away nothing. If the gentleman is a friend of Government ownership, I do not know whether he is or not, this bill will not meet with his approval. It is not a Government-ownership plan. I am not yet convinced that the Government of the United States can blow the nose of every citizen every morning in the year and do it better than the citizen can do it himself. I am not for Government ownership of water power.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It can blow the nose of Congress, however.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman can speak for his own good self.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am trying to speak, I am sure——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does not the gentleman believe the Government has the power and fitness to utilize some of the great natural resources of the country for the purpose of public benefit?

Mr. FERRIS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Why does that principle apply to minerals and not apply to water power?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Now, if the gentleman will let me proceed, I would be very glad to yield if I could. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that the Government does not operate mines, as the gentleman knows, so that question has no analogy.

Seventh. The Federal Government should at all times maintain the paramountcy, so it will at all times have full control over water power to the end that the natural monopoly of the water flowing from the highlands to the lowlands and finding its way back to the sea should not be a monopoly by which one man or set of men may torture all the rest of us who, perchance, use water power and hydroelectric energy.

Eighth. Annual reports should be exacted from the power companies, so that the public might at all times know of their acts and doings. This provision is highly essential.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for one simple question?

Mr. FERRIS. I really can not.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there a provision in this law to authorize an audit of expenditures made by the people who will have the grant made to them?

Mr. FERRIS. I think it does. I am not the last word on this bill, as I have not given it much attention.

Ninth. The Federal Government should reserve to itself full power to fix rates for service, capitalization, bond issues, and so forth, in interstate projects and, where there is no public-utilities commission for this purpose, in intrastate projects.

This is essential, so that the people can tell something about what is going on with a natural monopoly that belongs to them.

Tenth. Each lease, permit, or consent of Congress should contain a provision that upon proof that any such permittees, lessees, or grantees have conspired to prevent the development of water power or to limit the output of already constructed plants the lease should be revocable in a court of competent jurisdiction. Water power is a natural monopoly, and the greatest sort of care and caution should at all times be exercised in issuing permits that authorize its creation by strong, virile, vigorous laws and regulations. Something of this sort is due the teeming millions of America, who have the right to expect that this great national blessing will be carefully preserved for them and carefully preserved in their interest.

Water power, as is well known in this House, is a natural monopoly. Only a few can have it. The people ought to have something to do with the control of it. There are 35,000,000——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? Will the gentleman yield for one question only?

Mr. FERRIS. All right; go ahead.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If it is a natural monopoly that should be given a private corporation under lease, what provision is there for the regulation of rates?

Mr. FERRIS. We have complete power reserved in the Federal Government in this department bill, and it should be at all times maintained. I will say to the gentleman. Now, one word. There are 35,000,000 horsepower of hydroelectric energy in the United States, as estimated by the water-power engineers. Some go above that and some go below, but they all agree that that is a fair estimate. Only 6,000,000 of the 35,000,000 is in any sort of use, and the rest is running idly to the sea, a total waste. Is the Congress going to allow 110,000,000 of people to pay $30 a ton or $50 a ton for coal while there are 35,000,000 horsepower of hydroelectric energy running away to the sea, a total waste, every year?

I have tried, I know the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has tried, my committee has tried, but we have failed, and this is an additional trial, an additional chance of which we should avail ourselves.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I am afraid my time is getting away.

Mr. AUSTIN. It will be a very short question.

Mr. FERRIS. Go ahead.

Mr. AUSTIN. What about the regulation of the price of oil that is proposed to be taken off the Government reservations under the bill which the gentleman had passed through the House?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman must know that I can not go into that. I would like to discuss it with him, but I have only another minute. The only thing I want to say is this: That I appeal to the members of the committee that I know are in harmony with what I am saying, and to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that I know is in harmony, to let us get together with a long and a strong pull and put up a water-power policy that will induce the Senate to take it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of gossip, which I have heard and I have no doubt other Members have heard, about the personnel of this new committee, but the chairman of the Committee on Rules tells us there has been no combination made and no program; that it is left, as the wording of the rule provides, in the hands of the Speaker. That to me is entirely satisfactory. I recognize the propriety of some members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, some members of the Committee on the Public Lands, perhaps some members of the Committee on Agriculture, who have had this subject in charge, going on to such new committee, and I have no doubt the Speaker will recognize them. I have no doubt also that the Speaker will recognize that in the appointment on this committee questions of geography and different attitudes upon this whole problem should be recognized. And I have no doubt, consequently, that it will be a fair committee, representing the whole country and all interests in this controversy.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has not the gentleman some doubt all the time, even in the case of a special committee, of this manner of selecting a committee on the part of the House?

Mr. GILLETT. The rule is that all special committees shall be selected by the Speaker, and I am glad to have this committee selected by the Speaker, having entire confidence that all sections will be recognized, as well as the various points of view on this problem.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not practically necessary that some action of this kind be taken if we are to take action at all?

Mr. GILLETT. That is what I was going to say. I think it is criminal that no action has been taken before on this vital subject. Here are great water-power possibilities all over the country waiting for development. Here is capital waiting to develop them, and yet because Congress will not allow it to be done they are all tied up. Why, there are hundreds of thousands of unharnessed horsepower which would save hundreds of thousands of tons of coal, but simply because Congress has not acted, and apparently will not act, that is all wasted. Apparently the present committees are not going to act. I am sorry to say that I am not very sanguine that even with this new committee a bill will be passed, but it apparently is the only chance, and therefore I am willing to try it because, as I say, Mr. Speaker, in my view it is criminal that there should be this delay in the development of water power. I am particularly interested because of the Connecticut River.

The United States has not the slightest interest or title in that river, except by its power over a theoretically navigable stream, a stream which at Windsor Locks has rapids utterly unnavigable. For years there have been parties ready to obstruct this theoretically navigable stream, which is the only way of making it navigable, by building a dam or lock——

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether in his opinion the proposed bill would bar the Government from getting in and developing any water power it might need?

Mr. GILLETT. This proposed bill, marked "Confidential," was not given me until just now. I never saw it until a few moments ago.

Mr. POU. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, I had this bill printed by the request of at least 25 Members of the House.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why was not notice given to that effect?

Mr. TOWNER. It was given, and on the floor of the House.

Mr. GILLETT. Here is a river—the Connecticut—theoretically navigable, and capital is ready to put a big dam across it and build locks without expense to the Government and make it navigable, which it is not now; and, in addition, such a dam would produce thousands of horsepower which now is lying there idle because Congress will not enact any legislation on this subject. It is an outrage. I have no doubt that same condition exists all over the country, and it is a shame that we should not enact some legislation of this kind. It is an outrage that this mere theoretical jurisdiction which Congress has over such a river as that should prevent both actual navigation and actual use of the water power.

Therefore I hope that this new committee will be able to do what Congress has not been able to do in the past, and that it will give us some legislation, although I am not very confident about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin use some more of his time?

Mr. LENROOT. I am willing to. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish I could see my way clear to support this resolution, because I realize, as I think possibly all the Members of the House do, the importance of having legislation on the subject of water power.

But I am opposed to the creation of this new committee, first, because in my opinion the subject of water power on navigable streams and the questions involved in the utilization of water power on the public lands are so dissimilar that they can best be handled and disposed of by separate committees.

It occurs to me that it will be difficult to get a committee of 18 that are thoroughly well informed in relation to all the problems connected with the utilization of water power under such diverse conditions. For instance, the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, Mr. FERRIS, referring just a moment ago to one of the fundamental propositions, as I understand it, that should be contained in a water-power bill, stated that under no circumstances should there be a grant of water. Now, when you come to the question of the public lands of the West, in the arid States, the Federal Government owns no water, and there can not be any such a thing under the constitution of those States as a grant of ownership in water. The only right that any one can secure is the right to use, under certain conditions and under certain control. I just use that as an illustration.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not want the gentleman to understand that I meant to say that the Government can grant ownership of water. But we own the eye of the needle.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. The gentleman wants to have the fact of ownership of certain lands made the vehicle for the laying of a burden that I think ought not be laid on the development of the resources of the Western States.

I am not in entire agreement with the attitude of the Committee on the Public Lands on this question, but I would much prefer to leave the question with the Committee on the Public Lands, with its membership made up largely from the public-land States, than to intrust it to a committee selected so as to cover the entire country.

Then, another thing. I am not altogether happy over the conditions and circumstances surrounding the presentation of this matter to us. The proposition of a new committee is accompanied by a carefully prepared and properly indorsed and O. K'd and viséed bill, which the committee is supposed to take up and approve and present to Congress.

The gentleman who just spoke said the committee could take up such a bill and amend it and modify it as it saw fit. The trouble with that proposition is that a bill once prepared along certain lines can not well be modified and amended except in a a way to somewhat modify the carrying out of the theory on which the bill is drafted. One of the difficulties we have had here for quite a number of years past in respect to bills is a growing disposition to take our legislation from the departments. I shall be happy when the bills that are presented to the House shall have been prepared by the Members of the House or by committees of the House, and I shall be much more inclined to forgive and overlook errors in bills of that kind than in bills that are prepared for us and presented to us and over which we have no control or supervision except in the way of possibly changing by some minor amendments some relatively unimportant feature of the legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Not now. We all know that when a bill is presented to a committee, drafted along certain lines and on a certain theory, you can not easily modify the basic and important provisions, you can not greatly change the controlling lines along which the legislation has been prepared, without practically discarding the measure, and that it is practically impossible to do if the bill has any considerable support or influence behind it. The best that can be done under such circumstances is to make minor changes here and there, leaving the measure, in the main, as it was introduced—good, bad, or indifferent, as the case may be.

We need water-power legislation, it is true, but we ought to have sane and sensible legislation. I wish I were more hopeful of securing it under this plan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MCARTHUR].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of this rule we are confronted by a condition, not a theory.

Congress during the past two sessions, when this important subject has been under discussion, has been utterly unable to arrive at any conclusive understanding that would give to the country that water-power legislation which is so much needed to develop our latent resources, particularly in the far West. There has been a disagreement between this body and the Senate, with the result that we have not arrived at any common understanding where we can get legislation to promote the development of those resources. We have divergent views on the different angles of this water-power question. It is apparent that if we proceed along the same line that we have proceeded on before and have bills considered by the same committees as heretofore there will continue to be that disagreement between the House and the Senate, and the result will be that there will be no legislation of any character.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCARTHUR. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. What will the Government receive as profits by this action?

Mr. MCARTHUR. I can not answer that question. That is a matter that must be answered by experts.

Mr. LITTLE. Will we get anything?

Mr. MCARTHUR. I can not answer that now. That must be answered at the proper time by the proper authorities.

But here we have a proposition to create a special committee to take up the question of water-power legislation. We have failed dismally in the past to get anything under the old arrangement, and if this new proposition opens up any avenue or holds out any prospect of getting such legislation as the country is entitled to, I say, "For Heaven's sake, let us create this commission and let it go ahead." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Dakota is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I consider the legislation to be considered in reference to the leasing, development, and control of the water power of the country to be the most important legislation that will be considered during this Congress outside of actual war measures. I quite agree with other gentlemen that the country should now have definite legislation on this subject. This special committee will assist, I believe, in presenting legislation to Congress that the Congress can agree upon. I trust, however, that the members of the committee that may be appointed under the provisions of this resolution will not consider the great question either lightly or hastily. The committee should, as suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], guard against the danger of reporting a bill that may be ready prepared and submitted to the committee.

The people of the country—particularly the people of the West—are deeply interested in Federal legislation for the control and development of the water power of the country. They are interested in having conserved for the people of the country as well as can be the great water-power resources of the Nation. The thought and the view of the great masses of the American people on this subject should be very carefully considered by the committee in the making up of any bill to be favorably recommended to the House. It seems to me the Government should retain the fullest possible control of the great water-power resources of the country for the interests of all the people, and that whatever legislation this Congress enacts, it should be with this view in mind. I am personally in favor of having a special committee appointed which will be able to give sufficient time and the most careful consideration to all bills introduced on this most important subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how the time stands now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 9 minutes and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the gentleman from North Carolina more than one speech?

Mr. POU. I will yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that I am heartily in favor of the rule. There are more reasons to-day than ever in the history of our Nation for legislation that will result in water-power development. On account of the scarcity of fuel and the high price of coal, the reason for water-power development is more urgent and more important than ever before in the history of our country. I believe this committee ought to be provided for and that this House should use its best efforts at this time to bring about proper legislation upon this question. I do not understand the rule to mean that this committee of 18 is to be selected from the three committees—Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Agriculture, and the Public Lands. I do not believe that the Speaker ought to be confined to the selection of this committee from those three committees. He may find it best to select from those committees, but it may be that there are States in the Union more directly interested in water-power development, because they have the greatest amount of water power, which have no representation on these committees, and I trust that the Speaker will take that into consideration in appointing the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as we have plenty of time this afternoon I will use my half minute in asking unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes, not to be taken out of the time allotted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for five minutes, not to be taken out of the time allotted to the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] that the situation which now presents itself is a sad commentary on the ability of this Congress to carry through much needed legislation. In fact, it is but little better than a national scandal and disgrace that we have not acted on this subject before this time. We are contending against a power in this war that exercises its authority in the most autocratic manner, that proceeds with an energy and an efficiency that leaves nothing lacking, that acts with astonishing swiftness and velocity, commensurate with every emergency, and at this time here we are. We have tried to enact several bills. We have accomplished nothing. As the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] tells us, millions of horsepower are running to waste, and in the meantime homes are without sufficient coal; and worse than that, our munition factories are actually shutting down for want of coal, and our Army and our Navy are being deprived of much-needed ammunition because these factories can not be run on account of the want of power. Yet here we are, with millions of horsepower running to waste. I am willing to take the chance of some mistakes, of something possibly being done wrong as a result of this action if only we get something done in this emergency. The growing need is something that will not be denied, and if this House exercises its power and authority, as it ought to, and goes before the country and presents this issue before it, the country will sustain the Congress in demanding that some action be taken, and some action will be taken as a result of it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, it has been assumed by some of the speakers that there has been handed down from the executive branch of the Government, first, a bill, a confidential print of which has been made, and, second, this proposed rule creating a special committee. Now, in so far as this special committee is concerned, I wish to say that the first suggestion of this course came from myself. I am very glad that the President has adopted the suggestion and brought it before the Committee on Rules. We were confronted with this situation: As has been said, for years Congress has been endeavoring to enact water-power legislation, and it has failed in one body or the other, or there has been a deadlock in conference. Now, as has been stated, a bill has been prepared combining all the water-power propositions in one bill, and there is a very good reason for that, because the main essential principles relating to water-power legislation are common to both water powers upon the public lands and upon navigable streams. There are questions as to each that are entirely distinct. For instance, upon navigable waters we have the question of navigation. Upon the public lands we have the question of the use of the public lands aside from the actual water-power sites themselves; but the length of the charter, the conditions under which the license is to be granted, the conditions under which it may be taken over by the Government, the compensation to be charged, if any; those are principles that are common to both propositions, and legislation upon them ought to be uniform.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Just for a question.

Mr. FESS. The bill as it now is proposed could not be referred to any one committee?

Mr. LENROOT. I am just coming to that. That being true, that this is legislation embodying more than one proposition, if this was introduced by a Member, and the Speaker, called upon to refer it, he would be compelled to choose between the Committee on the Public Lands and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Each committee naturally would be jealous of its own jurisdiction with reference to this question, and there would be a contest on the floor of the House as to which committee the bill should go. The only practical thing, the only feasible thing, is to create such a committee as is proposed by this rule. I am frank to say that, while there has been no intimation, so far as I know, of anybody talking with the Speaker—I do not know of anybody who has had a word of conversation with him on this subject—I do assume that a majority of the members of this special committee will come from committees that have jurisdiction of this subject and are especially familiar with it.

In reference to the members of the committee it was suggested in the Committee on Rules that this resolution expressly provide that so many men come from this committee, so many from that, and so many from the other. That would involve this: Naturally there would be three Democrats and two Republicans to each committee, and the natural result would be that there would be a very large disproportion in the membership of that committee between the Republicans and the Democrats, and while there is no partisanship in this proposition, when the House is so evenly divided, the Speaker ought not to be bound by any such thing, and I assume, although I have not had a word with him—I assume that when this committee comes to be appointed it will be in the ratio of 10 Democrats to 8 Republicans; but he is left entirely free in that respect.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am sure the gentleman would not want to leave the impression that anyone insisted in the Committee on Rules in attempting to fix the number.

Mr. LENROOT. Not the slightest. It was a tentative suggestion that that should be done, and when discussed it was unanimously agreed that the resolution should not do it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And the question of party representation was raised by me.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; raised by the gentleman from Tennessee himself, so there was no contest in it in that regard.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I suppose the gentleman expects that some Members will be placed on the committee who can present a minority report from the standpoint of western States and western revenue.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman would expect the Speaker of this House, in appointing this committee, to have all views represented in so far as they have developed themselves into groups or different lines of opinion, and that both sides will be represented on this committee.

I may say, however, that I would also expect that the Speaker, in appointing this committee, would appoint a majority representing principles repeatedly indorsed by the House of Representatives in the bills heretofore passed. [Applause.] I am willing to rest upon that and I am sure when this committee is appointed there will be representatives upon it of the two different views, because we may as well recognize that throughout all this legislation the difficulty has been that there has been a small group in this House representing one view as to the water-power legislation and the majority in the Senate have agreed with them, and a majority in this House have represented another view and the minority in the Senate have agreed with them. This resolution proposes a plan whereby we can consider this entire question with the reasonable hope that before the Sixty-fifth Congress shall adjourn we will have secured a solution of this troublesome question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree with the gentleman that the resolution ought to be passed, but, in view of the importance of the question and it not being a purely select committee, in view of the fact that it is charged with such important legislation, why should not the committee be elected by the House?

Mr. LENROOT. The only suggestion I would make is that the same method is provided in this resolution that is provided with reference to all special and select committees. The rule in providing for the election of committees only provides for the standing committees. I do not know why the rule should be changed and enlarged at this time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The rule provides that the Speaker shall appoint select committees and committees of conference, but this is a committee charged with most important legislation.

Mr. LENROOT. Very often we have select committees charged with most important duties, and yet under the general rules of the House the Speaker appoints those committees. This committee, while it will last through this Congress, when they report the legislation, whatever it may be, and it passes the House, its functions are over, except some members of it may be in the committee of conference. It is in every sense a temporary committee, and when the work is done the committee is gone. It will not be renewed at another session unless, perchance, this legislation should not be concluded.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Allow me to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that many Members have dwelt upon the personnel of the committee. I have not the slightest doubt but that the Speaker will be most careful in considering appointments and that the committee will be well chosen, but this very system of appointing committees has been a great issue before the country. The predecessor of the present Speaker appointed his committees most wisely, but that was not the question. It was a question of the method of appointment. If we are to have a committee which it is conceded will deal with one of the most important questions before this Congress, is it not of sufficient importance for this House to proceed and elect it and not have it appointed by the Speaker?

Mr. LENROOT. So far as I am concerned, I think the result in this particular case would be practically the same whether the House selects the committee or whether the Speaker appoints it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The practical result was much the same before, several years ago, when we deprived the Speaker of that power.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, it seems that there is one proposition about which there is no controversy. It is agreed that it would be criminal to postpone action indefinitely upon this legislation. Now, the Committee on Rules has tried to proceed by unanimous consent as near as it could, and this resolution is the result of the conference of the Committee on Rules, and it comes in here with a unanimous report.

It seems that this is the best hope for legislation of this kind. There has been nothing cut and dried about the matter. There has been no limitation put upon anybody, and nobody has any authority to speak for the Speaker of the House. All gentlemen can do is to make predictions. We present this resolution as the best hope for action from this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE RECORD.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, on page 837 of the RECORD of yesterday I find the following:

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote and to lay that motion on the table.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be done.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object, Mr. Speaker.
Mr. RAKER. I make the motion, Mr. Speaker, to reconsider the vote and to lay that motion on the table.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman can not make that motion. The gentleman can move to reconsider, but he can not move to lay on the table.
The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] moves to reconsider——
Mr. RAKER. And lay that motion on the table.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No.
The SPEAKER. You can not.

That would indicate that the ruling of the Chair is that one could not make a motion to reconsider and lay that motion on the table at the same time. I rise to ask under a parliamentary inquiry whether it is not proper for a Member to make the motion to reconsider and at the same time make a motion to lay that motion on the table?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, the RECORD does not state accurately, according to my recollection at least, what I had in mind. I did not mean to make a point of order that the gentleman could not make the motion to reconsider and lay on the table. What I intended to do was to demand a division of the question in order that I might object to the latter part of it. Undoubtedly under the general parliamentary law a Member can make a motion to reconsider and that same Member can make a motion to lay that on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.
